

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

STORY OF AN EDINBURGH BOY.

ABOUT sixty or seventy years ago, the message-porters of Edinburgh, then called caddies, were a very important, and, as they still are, a very useful class of men, but particularly so to strangers, whom they served in some measure as what the French call valets-de-place. There were then no directories, no pocket-plans, or descriptions of the city, and no communication by subsidiary post-offices; neither were the houses numbered, as they are at the present day. All the duty, therefore, which is now performed by these ingenious contrivances, devolved upon the caddie. Without his assistance, the stranger could hardly have found his way through the city, for the seeing of sights or paying of visits; neither could he hold written communication with his friends through any medium so convenient and efficient as the caddie, who knew every hole and bore in the city, and every person residing in it of the smallest note. The scrupulous integrity, too, of these men, was no less remarkable than their intelligence. They could be safely trusted with property to any amount; and no instance, we believe, was ever known of any one of them having abused the confidence reposed in him. Strangers, therefore, who visited the city, either previously informed of the necessity of procuring the services of a caddie, or very soon discovering how indispensable some such assistance was, generally attached one of these men to their temporary establishments during their sojourn, to conduct them through the town, to deliver messages and notes to their friends and acquaintances, and to execute any small missions of a similar kind which they desired to have performed.

Doing in this respect as others did, Captain Chillingham, of His Majesty's 29th Regiment of Foot, quartered, at the time we allude to, in the castle of Edinburgh, employed a caddie of the name of Campbell to transact all that sort of business for him of which we have spoken. It was this man's custom to call every morning on his employer, at his room in the castle, to inquire whether he had anything to be done, or was likely to require his services during the day. On one of these occasions Campbell, when about a week's intercourse had placed him on something like a familiar footing with the captain, brought his son with him, a fine, stout, intelligent-looking boy of about fourteen or fifteen years of age, and introduced him to his employer, explaining at the same time the object which he had in view in doing so : this was to assure him that, in case he himself should happen at any time to be unable, in consequence of other engagements, to attend him or execute his commands, he might rely on receiving equally efficient services from his boy James, whom, he added, he felt satisfied the captain would find to be an uncommonly clever and active lad, faithful to his trust, and scrupulously honest : 'And, sir,' concluded the father, 'I hope your honour, therefore, will not hesitate to employ him.' Captain Chillingham looked at the boy ; and certainly, if he had not had every confidence in the integrity of his father, he might have been warranted in hesitating to accept the services of the son, under any circumstances which might demand probity as a qualification ; for although his countenance was prepossessing, his appearance, so far as dress went, was certainly not calculated to inspire very high ideas of his ability to resist temptation. He was barefooted and barelegged ; he wore no covering on his head ; and both his trousers and jacket were in rags. But in despite of all this, there was something redeeming in the expression of the boy's countenance, and Captain Chillingham did not fail to perceive it. He had a fine expressive dark eye in his head, and there was a frankness and manliness in his manner, which at once took the soldier's fancy, and induced him instantly to express his readiness to accept the services of the son when he could not command those of the father. From this period the boy gradually gained ground in the good opinion of the captain, who found him all and more than his father had represented him to be : and he at length became so great a favourite, that Mr Chillingham altogether dispensed with the services of the former, and relied solely on his son.

' You would make a capital soldier, James,' said Captain Chillingham to his little ragged messenger one day, after he had been some time in his service. ' Would you like to enlist ? '

' I would have no objection, sir,' said the boy, ' if you could make me an officer at once, and give me the command of men ; but I would na like to gang into the ranks.'

Captain Chillingham looked for an instant at the bare feet and legs and ragged jacket of the speaker, and burst into a fit of laughter. ' On my word, you are an ambitious chap,' said the captain ; ' but in the meantime take this card to Mr Wilson's, the advocate. He lives in the Canongate, you know ; and bring me his answer.'

' I'll do that,' replied the boy ; and he withdrew to execute his commission.

About three months after, Captain Chillingham's regiment received orders to proceed to Portsmouth, where it was to be embarked for Gibraltar. On the morning of their leaving the castle, James presented himself before his patron, from whom he had experienced much kindness, and to whom he was greatly attached, to take leave of him, which the warm-hearted boy did with tears in his eyes. His feelings were still more excited when his patron, the captain, made him a present of a seven-shilling piece, in recompense for any extraordinary trouble which he might have had with his commissions. As this was the first gold coin which Jemmy had ever been in possession of, his gratitude was immeasurable; and after thanking and making his best bow to one who had shewn him such kindness, he departed to his home at the head of the Cowgate, one of the happiest boys in Edinburgh.

It would not further our story, nor is it in any way essential to it, to enumerate the various destinations to which Captain Chillingham's regiment was assigned during the following ten years, but it is essential to state, that at the end of this period it was ordered to the East Indies. During this long interval, Captain Chillingham had never once been in England; but his constitution was now so much shattered by the vicissitudes of climate, to which he had been so long exposed, that he found it necessary, after he had been in India about two months, to solicit leave to return home for the benefit of his health. Having obtained this indulgence, he embarked at Bombay with a party who were about to proceed to England by the way of the Red Sea, where they were to disembark, and proceed overland, through part of Arabia and Egypt, to Alexandria.

The ship in which Captain Chillingham sailed with his party, which consisted of five persons, arrived safely at Cosseir, where they landed, and made preparations for crossing the Desert. At the close of the second day after their debarkation, these preparations were completed, and the travellers proceeded on their journey, accompanied by a long line of camels loaded with their luggage, and a week's supply of provisions for themselves and attendants. During the two subsequent days nothing of any consequence occurred to the travellers in the Desert.

They met, indeed, with several straggling Arabs and Turks, mounted on horseback and armed to the teeth, but these always conducted themselves civilly towards them, and generally went off after two or three words of courtesy. On the third day, however, just as the travellers were preparing to bivouac for the night, they were thrown into a state of great alarm by suddenly descrying a large body of armed and mounted Arabs, who rapidly approached them, and when within musket-shot, halted, as if to reconnoitre and arrange some plan of attack. They then formed themselves into a crescent, couched their spears, and in the next instant dashed at full gallop into the midst of the caravan, encircling it at the same time, so as to prevent the escape of any of the party. A number of the troop next dismounted, and commenced plundering the luggage of the travellers, and in a few minutes the ground was covered with opened and rifled packages. During this operation, he who seemed to be the leader of the troop, a remarkably fine-looking man of about six or eight-and-twenty years of age, and splendidly attired in the Turkish military fashion, remained at a short distance from the spoilers, in whose proceedings he took no part, and, indeed, seemed to take no interest. There was one object, however, which appeared to engross an extraordinary share of his attention : this was Captain Chillingham. On this gentleman he continued gazing with an earnestness and an expression of inquiry, that both attracted the notice and greatly surprised him who was the subject of it. Nor was this surprise by any means lessened, when he saw the Turkish or Arabian chieftain, or whatever he was, suddenly put spurs to his horse, and advance towards him at full gallop. On observing this, Captain Chillingham's first impression was, that he was about to be attacked, and he instinctively drew a pistol from his belt, cocked it, and held it in readiness in his hand to discharge it at his supposed enemy. The Turk on approaching nearer observed this indication of hostility on the part of the captain, and waved his hand impatiently to deprecate any inimical intentions.

Captain Chillingham understood the sign, and immediately dropped the point of his weapon. In the next instant the Turkish leader was beside him ; and what was his amazement when the former, looking at him again attentively for a moment, said in a low whisper, and in as good English as he himself could have spoken : ‘ Pray, sir, are you not Captain Chillingham of the 29th Regiment of Foot ? ’

It was some time before the extreme surprise of the latter, at being thus addressed by a Turk in full military costume, and in the middle of the deserts of Arabia, would permit his making any reply. At length, however, he stammered out, that he certainly was the person who had just been named.

‘ I thought so,’ replied the Turk ; and immediately added smilingly : ‘ Do you not recollect me, captain ? Look at me again ; ’ and he now raised his turban high on his forehead, to give a fuller view of his countenance.

‘ No ; upon my word, I do not,’ said Chillingham ; ‘ that is, perhaps, I think ’— and here he became extremely perplexed, for some of the features of this strange personage had begun to make certain confused and undefined impressions on him—‘ I think I may have seen a face somewhat resembling yours before, but where or when I really cannot tell, and, even in this, I think it very probable that I am mistaken.’

‘ Not at all,’ answered the Turk ; ‘ you are quite right. I’m James Campbell, frae the head o’ the Cowgate, the son of old Tammas Campbell the caddie, the little barefooted, ragged boy that used to run your messages when your regiment was quartered in the castle of Edinburgh.’

‘ Can it be possible that you are that person ? ’

‘ Indeed it is,’ replied the disguised Scotchman ; for we need not say that he was really the person he announced himself to be. ‘ I am, I assure you, captain, no other than your old acquaintance James Campbell, frae the head o’ the Cowgate ; and though mony a day sin’ syne, I have never forgotten your kindness in gieing me the gold seven-shilling piece. It was with that money I got some education at a school at the fit o' the Bow, and I have therefore reason to be mindful of what you did for me.'

We need not attempt to convey to the reader any idea of Captain Chillingham's surprise on this extraordinary disclosure being made to him, nor need we record the exclamations which that surprise elicited from him. All this will be readily conceived by the reader himself without our interference.

'But,' said Captain Chillingham, after a little desultory conversation had in some measure renewed the intimacy of the parties, and after Campbell had given a brief account of the various circumstances which had combined to place him in his present extraordinary situation — 'excuse me, I would rather see you, James' —

'Abdel Hassan, if you please,' interrupted the latter, with a smile on his moustached lip.

'Oh, I beg your pardon! Well, then, Abdel Hassan, since it is so, I say I would rather have met you again as an Edinburgh caddie than as the chief, which I take you to be, of a band of Arabian robbers.'

'Oh, but you mistake, Mr Chillingham,' replied Campbell hastily. 'These men, though they have attacked you certainly for the purpose of plundering you, are not robbers by profession: they are soldiers in the pay of the Turkish government, and I am their commander; but they could not resist the temptation of spoiling you, such opportunities rarely coming in their way; and it would have been more than my life was worth to have attempted to prevent them; but I will have every rascal of them soured for this when we get to Cosseir. I shall have the head taken from the shoulders of every tenth man of them at least, and the rest bastinadoed till they cannot stand: that they may depend upon. In the meantime, Captain Chillingham,' continued Campbell, 'I shall try, though at the risk of having my throat cut, to save your property, at anyrate, from their clutches, if you will be good enough to point it out to me. That of your friends, if it can be recovered at all, must be recovered by other means. What these means are, I shall mention before parting. Which are your camels, captain?' added Campbell. Mr Chillingham having pointed them out, the former immediately rode off towards them, and was shortly after seen speaking vehemently, and with threatening gestures, to those who were plundering the luggage they carried, pointing from time to time to the captain as he spoke. In a few minutes afterwards he rejoined the latter, and told him that he had succeeded in his object, and that his property was safe. 'As to that of your friends, Captain Chillingham,' he added, 'I hope on your account, that, with the assistance of the effendi at Coscoir, I shall recover the greater part of it at any-rate.' He then recommended the whole party—taking care, however, not to excite any suspicions of collusion amongst his own men by any of his communications with the travellers—to remain at Thebes until they heard from him, which he assured them would be in less than ten days.

Having said this, and once more bidden an affectionate adieu to his old patron and friend, Campbell placed himself again at the head of his troop, who were now in readiness to continue their march, having secured all the most portable and valuable portion of the travellers' effects, and in a few minutes the whole party started at full gallop, and were speedily lost in the distance in the Desert.

The travellers pursued their journey. They stopped at Thebes, as they had been recommended to do by Campbell; and within the time he had mentioned, the whole of their property, with the exception of some trifling articles, was restored to them; but from this moment, neither Captain Chillingham nor any of his party ever saw or heard more of the son of the Edinburgh caddie, alias Abdel Hassan the Turkish commander, further than that he was in high favour with the Turkish government, and in a fair way of becoming a very great man.

There only remains to be added to this little narrative

some account of the circumstances which led to so extraordinary a change in the condition of the principal subject of it. Young Campbell, who was naturally of an enterprising turn, and whose appetite for travelling had been excited by some of the stories in the Collections he had perused, by way of lessons, at the school at the foot of the Bow, had been employed as a servant to an English gentleman of large fortune, about to set out on a tour through the more interesting parts of Egypt. This foreign expedition was exactly the sort of thing which jumped with the erratic humour of the lad, and he accordingly proceeded, with great good-will, with his master. Most unfortunately, or perhaps fortunately, for Campbell, his master died in the course of his travels, by which event he was suddenly thrown upon his own resources. In these circumstances he applied for assistance and advice to the pacha of Kennah, who, struck with his personal appearance, which was singularly prepossessing, and with his intelligence, proposed, half jestingly and half in earnest, that he should remain where he was, and that he would procure him some military appointment under the Turkish government. Campbell at once closed with the offer; and his appearing in the character in which we have latterly exhibited him was the result. When met in the Desert by Mr Chillingham, he had been nearly seven years in the Turkish service; and in that time he had raised himself, by his bravery and good conduct, from one of the lowest commands in the army of that power, to the distinguished station he filled at the period alluded to in our story, and was, as already noticed, looked upon as one in the high road to further preferment.

[The editors, while they think it necessary to mention that there is nothing fictitious in this story but the names, cannot help pointing to it as an exemplification of the advantage which often accrues, unexpectedly, from conduct for which there was no other motive than general benevolence. The kindness which the officer manifested towards his temporary servant, in obedience simply to the demands of good feeling, was unquestionably the means of saving him, in a later period of life, and in a remote part of the world, from a very great misfortune ; and he thus purchased, at little more than a sentimental expense, what nothing else perhaps could have obtained for him, and what he certainly would have wanted, if he had happened to be a man of churlish nature, or one who looked upon his inferiors as a set of beings with whom he was expected to entertain no sympathy. It is thus made clear, that the man of kind nature, while exposed, it may be allowed, to some hazards through its operation, is also liable to reap from it great advantages : sowing, as it were, with gracious and soothing words, seeds which may afterwards grow up to his hand in splendidly-compensatory benefits.]

LUCRETIA AND MARGARET DAVIDSON, THE POET CHILDREN OF PLATTSBURG.

LUCRETIA.

MUCH attention has been excited in America by the touching history of the Misses Davidson of Plattsburg, two remarkable victims of the disease which manifests itself in what is called precocious genius. The enlightened part of our own community is now becoming aware, that precocious genius is the symptom of a disease, or perhaps we should speak more properly if we said an unhealthy organisation, and that it requires a very nice and careful treatment; in order that the dangers which it threatens may be averted. But still many are ignorant of the fact ; and it is only too common to see the parents of youthful prodigies urging them to severe mental tasks, when their endeavour ought rather to be to tempt them to amusements, bodily exercise, and vacation of mind. The great object of parents ought to be the physical culture—strengthening the bodily constitution—of their children; and this, along with the development of moral sentiments, is nearly all that should at first be attempted. Let those who neglect this rule, and with heedless pride urge an erroneous system of education, ponder on the story of Lucretia and Margaret Davidson.

These young ladies were the children of Dr Oliver Davidson, a medical man, we presume, in respectable circumstances. The mother is described as a woman of uncommonly susceptible feelings, and from her probably was derived that ardent temperament with which the daughters were so dangerously gifted. Both parents were alive in 1841. Lucretia, born in 1808, manifested a quick and studious mind when a mere child, and was early found liable to sudden alternations from high to low spirits. ‘As soon as she could read, her books drew her away from the plays of childhood, and she was constantly found absorbed in the little volumes that her father lavished upon her. Her mother, on one occasion in haste to write a letter, looked in vain for a sheet of paper. A whole quire had strangely disappeared from the table on which the writing implements usually lay: she expressed a natural vexation. Her little girl came forward confused, and said: “Mamma, I have used it.” Her mother, knowing she had never been taught to write, was amazed, and asked what possible use she could have for it.’

After some time, the mystery was explained. Although the child had as yet received no instruction in writing, she had filled one side of each sheet with a sketch of some familiar object; the other with Roman letters—some placed upright, others horizontally, obliquely, or backwards; not formed into words, nor spaced. Her parents pored over them till they ascertained that the letters were poetical explanations, in metre and rhyme, of the picture on the back of the paper. The first more regular attempt at composition was an epitaph on a pet robin. When about twelve, she accompanied her father to the celebration of Washington’s birthnight, and the fête excited her enthusiasm ; the result of which appeared the next day, when 'her eldest sister found her absorbed in writing. She had sketched an urn, and written two stanzas beneath it. She was persuaded to shew them to her mother ; she brought them blushing and trembling. Her mother was ill in bed ; but she expressed her delight with such unequivocal animation, that the child's face changed from doubt to rapture, and she seized the paper, ran away, and immediately added the concluding stanzas. When they were finished, her mother pressed her to her bosom, wept with delight, and promised her all the aid and encouragement she could give her. The sensitive child burst into tears. "And do you wish me to write, mamma ?—and will papa approve ?—and will it be right that I should do so ?" This trembling sensitiveness seems delightfully characteristic.

In her thirteenth year, the disposition to write seemed to have become an irresistible impulse. She penned her ideas rapidly, and sometimes expressed a wish that she had two pair of hands, to record as fast as she composed. Hitherto, she had attended a school in Plattsburg ; but in the following summer her health failed, and she was withdrawn from it to visit some friends in Canada. The novel scenes she there beheld, the cessation from study, and other causes, combined to renovate her health, and to fill her mind with bright and joyous emotions. But these were not the feelings of a volatile or thoughtless girl ; her increased joyousness of spirit found vent in pious gratitude. She had already become deeply impressed with the truths of religion, and amongst her most favourite studies were the books of Job, Jeremiah, and the Psalms, which, even as literary compositions, must take the precedence of all existing poetry. During the winter of 1823, she devoted herself more than ever to reading, her parents apparently foreseeing no danger from such an indulgence. Yet, while more than a woman in intellect, she retained the innocence, simplicity, and modesty of a child. To this she added a degree of personal loveliness which attracted universal admiration.

With a view to removing an extreme timidity which affected her, her mother was willing that she should enter a little into the gaieties suitable to her age. That important event, her first ball, was approaching; but how un-young-lady-like was her conduct on the occasion! When the day arrived, Lucretia was found reading, as usual, without one thought about the ball, and it was only when asked what she was to wear, that she remembered she had to attend it. Manifesting a girlish pleasure for a few minutes, she was quickly reabsorbed in her book. In the evening, when an elder sister went to seek her, in order to dress her hair, the young poetess was found engaged in the composition of a poem, moralising on what the world calls pleasure.

Shortly after, two events occurred in the quiet cottage household of the Davidsons: Lucretia's elder sister became a wife, and a younger sister was born, as if the loss of one loved companion was to be compensated by the appearance of another. On the 26th of March 1823, Margaret Miller Davidson, the other subject of these memoirs, came into the world. New emotions were called forth in Lucretia's mind by the event. The following lines from her published poems were written about this time:—

'Sweet babe! I cannot hope that thou'lt be freed From woes, to all since earliest time decreed;
But mayst thou be with resignation blessed
To bear each evil, howsoe'er distressed!

May Hope her anchor lend amid the storm,
And o'er the tempest rear her angel form;
May sweet Benevolence, whose words are peace,
To the rude whirlwind softly whisper—cease!

And may Religion, Heaven's own darling child,
Teach thee at human cares and griefs to smile;
Teach thee to look beyond that world of wo,
To Heaven's high fount whence mercies ever flow.

And when this vale of tears is safely passed,
When death's dark curtain shuts the scene at last,
May thy freed spirit leave this earthly sod,
And fly to seek the bosom of thy God!'

Strong as her passion for poetry was, there was a stronger feeling which predominated in Lucretia's mind—and this was filial love. After the birth of the infant, Mrs Davidson was very ill, ‘and to add,’ says Miss Sedgwick, ‘to the calamity, her monthly nurse was taken sick, and left her; the infant, too, was ill. Lucretia sustained her multiplied cares with firmness and efficiency; the conviction that she was doing her duty gave her strength almost preternatural. I shall again quote her mother’s words, for I fear to enfeeble by any version of my own the beautiful example of this conscientious little being: “Lucretia astonished us all: she took her station in my sick-room, and devoted herself wholly to the mother and the child; and when my recovery became doubtful, instead of resigning herself to grief, her exertions were redoubled, not only for the comfort of the sick, but she was an angel of consolation to her afflicted father. We were amazed at the exertions she made, and the fatigues she endured; for, with nerves so weak, a constitution so delicate, and a sensibility so exquisite, we trembled lest she should sink with anxiety and fatigue. Until it ceased to be necessary, she performed not only the duty of a nurse, but acted as superintendent of the household.” When her mother became convalescent, Lucretia continued her attentions to domestic affairs. “She did not so much yield to her ruling passion, as to look into a book, or take up a pen,” says her mother, “lest she should again become so absorbed in them as to neglect to perform those little offices which a feeble, affectionate mother had a right to claim at her hands.” But this self-denial was not accomplished without a great sacrifice. ‘Her mother detected tears occasionally on her cheeks, was alarmed by her excessive paleness, and expressed her apprehensions that she was ill. “No, mamma,” she replied; “not ill—only out of spirits.” Mrs Davidson then remarked, that of late she never read or wrote. She burst into tears—a full explanation followed, and Lucretia was allowed again to take up her pen, though recommended to give it only a part of her time. Lucretia became once more cheerful, read and wrote, and practised drawing. She had a decided taste for drawing, and excelled in it. She sung over her work, and in every way manifested the healthy condition that results from a wise obedience to the laws of nature.'

During Lucretia's fifteenth summer, she visited her married sister, Mrs Townsend, in Canada; and on returning to Plattsburg, she resumed her poetic fancies. 'It was about this time that she finished Amir Khan, and began a tale of some length, which she entitled the Recluse of the Saranac. Amir Khan has long been before the public, but we think it has suffered from a general and very natural distrust of precocious genius. The versification is graceful, the story well developed, and the Orientalism aptly sustained. We think it would not have done discredit to our best popular poets in the meridian of their fame; as the production of a girl of fifteen, it seems prodigious. On her mother discovering and reading a part of her romance, Lucretia manifested her usual shrinkings, and with many tears exacted a promise that she would not again look at it till it was finished. She never again saw it till after her daughter's death. Lucretia had a most whimsical fancy for cutting sheets of paper into narrow strips, sewing them together, and writing on both sides; and once playfully boasting to her mother of having written some yards, she produced a roll, and forbidding her mother's approach, she measured off twenty yards! She often expressed a wish to spend one fortnight alone, even to the exclusion of her little pet-sister; and Mrs Davidson, eager to afford her every gratification in her power, had a room prepared for her use. Her dinner was sent up to her; she declined coming down to tea; and her mother, on going to her apartment, would find her writing, her plate untouched.'

We now approach the darker shades of this touching history. A gentleman, who was an intimate and early friend of the Davidsons, to whom some of Lucretia's effusions were shewn, saw in them a genius which he thought only required cultivation to become transcendent. He proposed to take upon himself the expense of her future education. The parents, already proud of so gifted a daughter, did not withstand the temptation which this offer held out; and on the 24th November 1824, Lucretia left her home to become an inmate of a ladies' seminary, which bears a high character in the state of New York. At first, the novelty of the change filled her letters with expressions of delight; but a home-sickness soon crept over her, and a deep tinge of melancholy pervades some of her succeeding communications. An arrangement of these boarding-schools, that bore very hard upon Miss Davidson, was the public examination—an ordeal trying enough to most young ladies, and not always unattended with injurious effects on health. The following playful verses of our heroine describe the troubles of the week preceding this grand exhibition:—

' One has a headache, one a cold,
One has her neck in flannel rolled;
Ask the complaint, and you are told,
" Next week's examination."

One frets and scolds, and laughs and cries,
Another hopes, despairs, and sighs;
Ask but the cause, and each replies,
" Next week's examination."

One bans her books, then grasps them tight,
And studies morning, noon, and night,
As though she took some strange delight
" In these examinations."

The books are marked, defaced, and thumbed,
The brains with midnight tasks benumbed,
Still, all in that account is summed,
" Next week's examination."

The examination, however, passed off creditably to Lucretia, though, it is to be feared, not without accelerating the fatal issue. It was now becoming too plain that this child of promise was to be one of those who fall in 'the morn and liquid dew of youth.' After a considerable interval in her correspondence, which excited the alarm of her friends, she wrote a letter which was scarcely legible, and which realised the worst fears. Mrs Davidson instantly set off to see her daughter. Lucretia's first words were: 'Oh, mamma, I thought I should never have seen you again! But now I have you here, and can lay my aching head upon your bosom, I shall soon be better.' It was resolved that she should be removed to Plattsburg in spite of her debility, and the journey was accomplished without any apparently ill consequences. "Her joy upon finding herself at home," says her mother, "operated for a time like magic." The sweet, health-giving influence of domestic love, the home-atmosphere, seemed to suspend the progress of her disease, and again her father, brothers, and friends were deluded; all but the mother and the sufferer. She looked, with prophetic eye, calmly to the end. There was nothing to disturb her. That kingdom that cometh "without observation" was within her, and she was only about to change its external circumstances, about to put off the harness of life in which she had been so patient and obedient. To the last she manifested her love of books. A trunk filled with them had not been unpacked. She requested her mother to open it at her bedside, and as each book was given to her, she turned over the leaves, kissed it, and desired to have it placed on a table at the foot of her bed. There they remained to the last, her eye often fondly resting on them.' This was 'the ruling passion strong in death,' for that was fast approaching.

Though it is not expressly stated in the memoir, we gather from the context that the gifted young poetess ended her brief career in July 1825. What must have deepened the grief of her friends was, the extreme personal beauty which, besides genius, Lucretia possessed. Latterly, her loveliness was much enhanced by the rose-like glow—deep, yet delicate—imparted to her cheeks by the fatal malady—consumption.

Of Miss Davidson's poetical talents there cannot be two opinions. Though the short pieces we have quoted exhibit no striking passages, or ideas which deserve to be called brilliant, yet they possess a more valuable quality—they are natural; they are girl-like. In Lucretia Davidson's poems 'there is,' says Dr Southey in the Quarterly Review, 'enough of originality, enough of aspiration, enough of conscious energy, enough of growing power, to warrant any expectations, however sanguine, which the patrons and the friends, and parents of the deceased could have formed.'

Besides several short pieces, Lucretia Davidson's Remains contain the second part of a highly-wrought poetical tale of American-Indian warfare, called Chicomico. From Amir Khan we extract a moonlight scene, which it would be difficult to match from the works of our best poets. It is all repose and gentleness :—

• Brightly o'er spire, and dome, and tower,
The pale moon shone at midnight hour,
While all beneath her smile of light
Was resting there in calm delight ;
Evening with robe of stars appears,
Bright as repentant Peri's tears,
And o'er her turban's fleecy fold
Night's crescent streamed its rays of gold,
While every crystal cloud of heaven Bowed as it passed the Queen of Even.

Beneath—calm Cashmere's lovely vale *
Breathed perfumes to the sighing gale ;
The amaranth and tuberose,
Convolvulus in deep repose,
Bent to each breeze which swept their bed,
Or scarcely kissed the dew and fled ;
The bulbul,† with his lay of love,
Sang 'mid the stillness of the grove ;
The gulnare ‡ blushed a deeper hue,
And trembling shed a shower of dew,
Which perfumed ere it kissed the ground,
Each zephyr's pinion hovering round.
The lofty plane-tree's haughty brow
Glittered beneath the moon's pale glow ;
And wide the plantain's arms were spread,
The guardian of its native bed.'

For the present, we drop the curtain upon this touching tragedy. The fate of another and hardly less interesting actor has yet to be recorded.

* Cashmere, called the Happy Valley, the Garden in Perpetual Spring, and the Paradise of India.

M A R G A R E T.

On the death of her sister Lucretia, Margaret Davidson was only two years old, and at the age of eleven she is introduced by her biographer to the reader. Washington Irving relates, that, in 1833, he had an interview with Mrs Davidson on the subject of a new edition of her late daughter Lucretia's works. While conversing with her, he continues: 'I observed a young girl, apparently not more than eleven years of age, moving quietly about her; occasionally arranging a pillow, and at the same time listening earnestly to our conversation. There was an intellectual beauty about this child that struck me; and that was heightened by a blushing diffidence when Mrs Davidson presented her to me as her daughter Margaret. Shortly afterwards, on her leaving the room, her mother, seeing that she had attracted my attention, spoke of her as having evinced the same early poetical talent that had distinguished her sister, and, as evidence, shewed me several copies of verses remarkable for such a child. On further inquiry, I found that she had very nearly the same moral and physical constitution, and was prone to the same feverish excitement of the mind and kindling of the imagination, that had acted so powerfully on the fragile frame of her sister Lucretia. I cautioned the mother, therefore, against fostering her poetic vein, and advised such studies and pursuits as would tend to strengthen her judgment, calm and regulate the sensibilities, and enlarge that common sense which is the only safe foundation for all intellectual superstructure.' With a full conviction of the soundness of this advice, Mrs Davidson had too much to contend against to carry it fully into effect, from the additional excitement produced in the mind of this sensitive little being by the example of her sister, and the intense enthusiasm she evinced concerning her. Besides this, from the first dawnings of childhood, it was evident that Margaret Davidson possessed a strong intellect: her ideas and expressions were not like those of other children, and often startled her friends by their precocity. Hence, it was judiciously thought dangerous to teach her to read at too early an age; but once able to do so, reading absorbed every spare moment.

Besides the faculty of writing poetry, which she developed at six years of age, this second prodigy in the Davidson family possessed the curious and amusing ability of extempore story-telling. She was able to carry on a narrative for hours together, preserving all the time a due individuality among the characters, and a proper degree of probability in the incidents. 'This early gift caused her to be sought by some of the neighbours, who would lead her unconsciously into an exertion of her powers. Nothing was done by her from vanity or a disposition to "show off," but she would become excited by their attention, and the pleasure they seemed to derive from her narration. When thus excited, a whole evening would be occupied by one of her stories; and when the servant came to take her home, she would observe, in the phraseology of the magazines, "the story to be continued in our next."

In 1830, an English gentleman, who had been strongly interested by perusing the biography and writings of Lucretia Davidson, visited Plattsburg in the course of a journey from Quebec to New York, to see the place where she was born and had been buried. Margaret, whom he accidentally saw, contracted, though only seven years of age, a strong friendship for this gentleman, and with her mother, accompanied him on a visit to New York. On parting at length with her friend, she received a letter, together with presents of books and various tasteful remembrances; but the sight of them only augmented her affliction. She wrapt them all carefully in paper, and treasured them up in a particular drawer, where they were daily visited, and many a tear shed over them.

Like her sister, Margaret Davidson possessed a talent for drawing; and on one occasion, when her mother was so dangerously ill as to preclude all hope of recovery, 'one of the most touching sights was to see this affectionate and sensitive child tasking herself to achieve a likeness of her mother, that it might remain with her as a memento. "How often would she sit by my bed," says Mrs Davidson, "striving to sketch features that had been vainly attempted by more than one finished artist; and when she found that she had failed, and that the likeness could not be recognised, she would put her arms round my neck, and weep, and say: 'Oh, dear mamma, I shall lose you, and not even a sketch of your features will be left me; and if I live to be a woman, perhaps I shall even forget how you looked!' This idea gave her great distress, sweet lamb! I then little thought this bosom would have been her dying pillow."

'After being reduced to the very verge of the grave, Mrs Davidson began slowly to recover, but a long time elapsed before she was restored to her usual degree of health. Margaret, in the meantime, increased in strength and stature; she still looked fragile and delicate, but she was always cheerful and buoyant. To relieve the monotony of her life, which had been passed too much in a sick-chamber, and to preserve her spirits fresh and elastic, little excursions were devised for her about the country, to Missique Bay, St John's, Alburgh, Champlain, &c. The following lines, addressed to her mother on one of these occasional separations, will serve as a specimen of her compositions in this the eighth year of her age, and of the affectionate current of her feelings:—

' Farewell, dear mother ! for awhile
I must resign thy plaintive smile ;
May angels watch thy couch of wo,
And joys unceasing round thee flow !

May the Almighty Father spread
His sheltering wings above thy head !
It is not long that we must part,
Then cheer thy downcast, drooping heart.

Remember, oh ! remember me ;
Unceasing is my love for thee.
When death shall sever earthly ties,
When thy loved form all senseless lies,

Oh ! that my soul with thine could flee,
And roam through wide eternity ;
Could tread with thee the courts of heaven,
And count the brilliant stars of even !

Farewell, dear mother ! for awhile
I must resign thy plaintive smile ;
May angels watch thy couch of wo,

During another visit to New York, the young poetess, having engaged herself for a private theatrical scheme, agreed to write a play. Four or five days had been spent in preparing dresses, scenery, and other accessories, when she was called upon to produce the play. ' Oh,' she replied, ' I have not written it yet.' ' But how is this ? Do you make the dresses first, and then write the play to suit them ? ' ' Oh,' replied she gaily, ' the writing of the play is the easiest part of the preparation : it will be ready before the dresses.' And, in fact, in two days she produced her drama, The Tragedy of Alethia. Though not very voluminous, it contained enough of strong character and astounding incident to furnish a drama of five times its size.

Mrs Davidson, finding the wintry winds of Lake Champlain too severe for her constitution, removed from Plattsburg to Ballston. Here, amidst her own family, she wisely determined her daughter should continue her education—the former experiment warning her against sending the child to school. It was thus that Margaret acquired knowledge rapidly. She shewed a great aptitude for learning languages, and made some progress in French and Latin. But amidst all this, the family enemy made its dreaded appearance. She was frequently attacked with symptoms which too surely foretold pulmonary consumption. ' After a confinement of two months, however, she regained her usual, though at all times fragile, state of health. In the following spring, when she had just entered upon the eleventh year of her age, intelligence arrived of the death of her sister, Mrs T—, who had been resident in Canada. The blow had been apprehended from previous accounts of her extreme illness, but it was a severe shock. In the following lines, poured out in the fulness of her grief, she touchingly alludes to the previous loss of her sister Lucretia, so often the subject of her poetic regrets, and of the consolation she had always felt in still having a sister to love and cherish her :—

'ON THE DEATH OF MY SISTER ANNA ELIZA.

While weeping o'er my sister's tomb,
And heaving many a heartfelt sigh,
And while in youth's bewitching bloom,
I thought not that thou too couldst die.

When gazing on that little mound,
Spread o'er with turf, and flowers, and mould,
I thought not that thy little form
Could be as motionless and cold.

When her light airy form was lost
To fond affection's weeping eye,
I thought not we should mourn for thee ;
I thought not that thou too couldst die.

Yes, sparkling gem ! when thou wert here,
From death's encircling mantle free,
Our mourning parents wiped each tear,
And cried : " Why weep ? we still have thee."

Each tender thought on thee they turned,
Each hope of joy to thee was given,
And, dwelling on each matchless charm,
They half forgot the saint in heaven.

But thou art gone, for ever gone,
Sweet wanderer in a world of wo !
Now, unrestrain'd our grief must pour ;
Unchecked our mourning tears must flow.'

The disease gradually developed itself, in spite of the best medical skill that could be procured ; and every expedient, such as change of scene and climate, which it was possible to devise, was tried in vain. At length it became absolutely imperative that she should be forbidden the excitement of poetical composition ; and for six months she scarcely touched a pen ; but during that period she was restless and unhappy. At length, unable to resist the temptation of writing, she exclaimed one day, while seated by her mother : “Mamma, I must write ! I can hold out no longer ! I will return to my pen, my pencil, and my books, and shall again be happy !” I pressed her to my bosom, and cautioned her to remember she was feeble. “Mother,” exclaimed she, “I am well ! I wish you were only as well as I am.” The heart of the mother was not proof against these appeals : indeed, she had almost as much need of self-denial on this subject as her child, so much did she delight in these early blossomings of her talent. Margaret was again left to her own impulses.

After this, confinement to a house so contrived as to possess a graduated temperature, a round of cheerful occupations, and the unremitting care taken of her, seemed to alleviate the more alarming symptoms. But the hopes thus raised were of short duration. The atmosphere of approaching winter produced a visible alteration for the worse, and Margaret Davidson felt a presentiment that her end was drawing near ; but this anticipation produced no despondency. The closing scene is thus described by Mrs Davidson, whom a friend was assisting in the duties of nursing, and who, during a temporary absence, hastily summoned her to her daughter’s bedside. ‘I stepped to the fire, and threw on a wrapper, when Margaret stretched out both her arms, and exclaimed : “Mother, take me in your arms !” I raised her, and seating myself on the bed, passed my arms round her waist ; her head dropped upon my bosom, and her expressive eyes were raised to mine. That look I never shall forget ; it said : “Tell me, mother, is this death ?” I answered the appeal as if she had spoken. I laid my hand on her white brow ; a cold dew had gathered there. I spoke : “Yes, my beloved, it is almost finished.” She gave one more look, two or three short fluttering breaths, and all was over. Her spirit was with its God : not a struggle or groan preceded her departure. She died on the 25th of November 1838, aged fifteen years and eight months.’

The genius of Margaret Davidson differed from that of her sister, in leading her into subjects of active rather than passive life. It was of a more dramatic cast; her talents and bent for narrative poetry making this difference between her own and her sister's genius. Her longest work is the story of Lenore, which is told in graceful and sometimes forcible versification.

The volumes before us are reprinted from the original edition, and thus return the compliment of republication which the Americans pay to every popular work that comes out in Great Britain. The works, though cheap in price, are neatly got up, and, with admonitory hints from parents, might form judicious presents to young persons.

ESCAPE OF BRITISH OFFICERS FROM FRANCE.

BY PASCOE GRENFELL HILL, R.N.

IN the beginning of the year 1850, during a short stay at Brussels, I had the pleasure of forming an acquaintance with a veteran officer, Commander Boys, R.N., than whom few of his profession have endured greater hardships in the service of their country. He took a gratification in relating to me the dangers through which he had passed in the adventures of his youthful days, the most remarkable of which was his escape, with three brother midshipmen of the British navy, from the French citadel of Valenciennes. The design of the following narrative is to present, nearly in the gallant captain's own words, the history of this remarkable affair, in which the firmness, coolness in danger, and indefatigable perseverance of four young British officers, appear to be worthy of lasting record.

'On the 4th of August 1803,' said Captain Boys, 'being then a midshipman of the Phœbe, the Hon. F. B. Capel, on the Mediterranean station, and in charge of a small prize, I was captured by a French frigate, and taken into Toulon two days afterwards. I was thence marched, with some other prisoners of war, through France, being allowed to stop some weeks on parole at Toulouse, by the way. On the 21st of January 1804, we reached Verdun, at that time the central dépôt for officers on parole, as well as for the déténus whom the harsh decree of Napoleon, in breach of the usages observed in civilised nations, detained on the continent, where they were peaceably residing at the outbreak of the war. After remaining upwards of four and a half years at Verdun, I was removed, with seventy-two others, under strong escort to Valenciennes, where we arrived August 17, 1808.

'Here we were lodged in the fortress of the town, a pretext having been found to take away the privilege of parole from us, and I immediately set my mind actively at work to devise a plan of escape. By aid of one of the déténus in the city of Valenciennes, I obtained a map and provisions, and imparted my plans to two brother-midshipmen, Hunter and Whitehurst, who agreed to join me. Another midshipman, Mansell, afterwards made a fourth in the party.

'We fixed the night of the 15th of November for the attempt. In the meantime, my friend the détenu, resident in the town, got iron handles put to a pair of steel boot-hooks which I intended to use as picklocks. The only thing now wanting was another rope; and as that belonging to the well in our yard was, from decay, not trustworthy, in the night we hacked several of the heart yarns, so that the first time it was used in the morning it broke. A subscription was made by the mids, and a new rope applied for, by which means we had at command about thirty-six feet in addition to what our friend had before purchased for us. At length, we prepared to start, and had everything in readiness; but the night proved too calm and clear, and the attempt was postponed till next night at eight P.M. The well-rope was accordingly replaced, and we retired to bed.

'Next night, at half-past seven, we assembled, each provided with a clasp-knife and a paper of fine pepper, of which, in case of being closely attacked, we intended to throw a handful into the eyes of our assailants, and then retreat. The plan was, that Hunter and I were to depart first, to fix the rope, and open the opposing doors. A quarter of an hour afterwards Whitehurst and Mansell were to follow. By these arrangements, we lessened the risk attendant on so large a body as four moving together, and secured the advantage of each depending more on his own care; for if Hunter and I were shot in the advance, the other two would remain in safety; and if, on the contrary, they were discovered, we hoped during the alarm to have time to gain the country.

' It was now blowing very fresh, and was so dark and cloudy that not a star could be seen; the leaves were falling in abundance, and, as they were blown over the stones, kept up a constant rustling noise, particularly favourable to the enterprise. At a quarter past eight, Hunter and I, with woollen socks over our shoes, that our footsteps might not be heard, and having each a rope, a small poker, a stake, and a knapsack, took leave of our friends, and departed.

' We first went into the back-yard, and got over the wall, passed through the garden and the palisades beyond, and climbed cautiously upon our hands and knees up the bank, at the back of the north guard-room, lying perfectly still as the sentinels approached, and as they receded, again advancing, till we reached the parapet over the northern gateway, which leads to the upper citadel. Here the breastwork over which we had to creep was about five feet high and fourteen feet thick; and it being the highest part of the citadel, we were in danger of being seen by several sentinels below, but happily, the cold bleak wind induced some of them to keep within their boxes. With the utmost precaution, we crept upon the summit, and down the breastwork towards the outer edge of the rampart, when the sentinel made his quarter-hourly cry that all was well. So far we were safe. By means of a poker and stake forced into the earth, we now fastened one end of the rope, and by the other, slipped down the rampart. I then crossed the bridge, and waited for Hunter, who descended with equal care and silence. We then entered the ravelin, proceeded through the arched passage which forms an obtuse angle with a massive doorway leading to the upper citadel, and with my picklock I endeavoured to open the door. Not finding the bolt yield to gentle pressure, I added the other hand, and gradually increased the force until, by exerting my whole strength, something broke. I then tried to file the catch of the bolt, but that being cast-iron, the file made no impression. We next endeavoured to cut away the stone in the wall which receives the bolt, but that was fortified by a bar of iron. The picklocks were again applied, but with no better success. It now appeared to be a complete stop. Happily, it occurred to me that it would be possible to undermine the gate. This plan was no sooner proposed than commenced; but having no other implements than our pocket-knives, some time elapsed before we could indulge any reasonable hopes of success. The pavement stones under the door were about ten inches square, and so closely bound together, that it was a most difficult task to remove them. While at this terrible task, we were reinforced by our two friends, and the whole party set to work in the confidence of success. At half-past ten the first stone was raised, and in twenty minutes more the second; about eleven, the hole was large enough to allow us to creep under the door. The drawbridge was drawn up, but between the door and it there was sufficient space to allow us to climb up; and the drawbridge being square, there was of course an opening between it and the arch above: through this opening we crept, lowered ourselves by the second rope, which we passed round the chain of the bridge, and, keeping both parts of the rope in our hands, landed on the garde fous—two iron bars suspended by chains on each side of the bridge, serving the purpose of hand-rails. By keeping both parts of the rope in our hands, the last man who descended was enabled to bring it away.

‘ We then proceeded through another arched passage, with the intention of undermining the second door; but to our great surprise and joy, we found that the gendarmes had neglected to lock it. The drawbridge was up; this, however, detained us but a short time: we got over, and crossed the ditch upon the garde fous, as before, and landed in the upper citadel. We proceeded to the north-east curtain of the fortress, fixed the stake, and fastened the rope upon the breastwork for the fourth descent. As I was getting down, with my chest against the edge of the parapet, the stake gave way. Whitehurst, who was sitting by it, grasped the rope, and Mansell caught hold of Whitehurst’s coat, to keep him back, whilst I endeavoured to hold on by the grass, which saved me from a fall of about fifty feet. Happily, there was a solitary tree in the citadel; from this a second stake was cut, and the rope doubly secured as before. We now all got down safe with our knapsacks.

‘ I cannot describe the feelings with which at this moment, in the excess of joy, we all shook hands, and heartily congratulated ourselves on our success, after a perilous and laborious work of three hours and three-quarters.

‘ Having put our knapsacks a little in order, we mounted the glacis, and followed a footpath which led to the eastward. Gaining the high road, we passed—two and two, about forty paces apart—through a very long village; and, having travelled three or four miles, felt ourselves so excessively thirsty, that we stopped to drink from a ditch. Directing our course by the north star, which was occasionally visible, we passed through a small town without seeing a creature. About an hour afterwards, we quitted the high road, and drew towards a rising-ground, there to wait the dawn of day, in the hope of retreating to some neighbouring copse. No sooner had we laid ourselves upon the ground than sleep overcame us.

‘ Our intention was, if no wood could be seen, to go to an adjoining ploughed field, and there scratch a hole in which we might hide ourselves from distant view. Upon awakening from a short slumber, we reconnoitred our position, and found it to be near a fortification, which, being well acquainted with such places, we approached in hope of finding an asylum. At break of day we descended into the ditch, and found the entrance into the subterraneous works of the covered-way nearly all blocked up with ruins and bushes : an opening was made, we crept in, our quarters were established, and the rubbish and bushes replaced, in the space of a few minutes. Here we remained in safety ; for we had got beyond the range of country which, we afterwards learned, had been searched for us. On examining our maps, we found that our retreat was the ruined fortification of Tournay. At three P.M. we enjoyed our dinner, notwithstanding the want of beverage—for on examining our knapsacks we found the flasks broken. Whitehurst having lost his hat in descending the first rampart at Valenciennes, was occupied in manufacturing a cap from the skirts of his coat. It rained all the afternoon ; and the weather getting worse in the evening, detained us till ten P.M., when, as no prospect of its clearing up presented itself, we quitted our comfortable shelter, walked round the citadel to the westward, over ploughed ground, until, coming to a turnip - field, we regaled ourselves most sumptuously. By eleven we had rounded the town, and gained the north road.

‘ During the night we passed through several villages, without seeing any one, and at six A.M. arrived at the suburbs of Courtray, expecting there to find as snug a retreat as that which we had left on the preceding evening ; but, to our mortification, the town was enclosed by wet ditches, which obliged us to seek safety elsewhere. Observing a farmhouse on the right, we directed our steps towards it, and thence through by-lanes until a mansion was discovered, which we approached in hope of finding an outhouse to afford us shelter for the day. Nothing of the kind could be seen ; but not far distant we descried a thicket of about 150 paces square, surrounded by a wet ditch from 14 to 20 feet wide. Here, then, we determined to repose our wearied limbs, and it being daylight, not a moment was to be lost. The opposite side of the ditch at its narrowest part was one entire bed of brambles, and into the midst of these we were obliged to leap. Hunter, Mansell, and I got over tolerably well; but when Whitehurst made the attempt, stiff with wet and cold, the bank giving way from his weight, he jumped into the water, and was with difficulty extricated, not without being dragged through the brambles, by which he was severely scratched. We lay down in the centre of this swampy thicket. The rain had continued without intermission from the time of our leaving Tournay; and though it somewhat annoyed us, we were consoled by the additional security it afforded. We remained in this secure spot till night, when we departed, and having gained the high road, we marched on at a great rate, guided by the north star, and assisted by a strong southern wind. About ten o'clock we entered the village of Haerlabeck. Observing a public-house at the north end, Whitehurst here purchased bread and gin, our remaining bread being completely soaked with moisture. This regale revived and fortified us against the inclemency of the weather, which we apprehended might produce sickness. At one A.M. the rain recommenced, and in such profusion that it obliged us to retreat to the protection of a haystack near the road, where we lay some time; but finding no prospect of fine weather, resumed our march until five, and then entered a wood about three miles from Deynse. We chose a spot in the thickest part, where we fenced ourselves with fallen leaves, twigs, and rubbish of about a foot in height, and slept until daybreak, when, finding our position too exposed, from proximity to a cottage and to the main road, we broke up the camp, and penetrated farther into the wood. Here we concealed ourselves as before, and remained during the day, listening to the howling of the wind, which rose gradually to a furious storm of driving sleet, rain, and hail, and such was its violence, that our garments were scarcely felt to be a covering.

' We quitted this road soon after dark, and gained the high road to Deynse. After marching about an hour, and passing several people, we were overtaken by two mounted gendarmes ; but it being exceedingly dark, they took us for conscripts—part of their own escort—for one of them, in a muffled tone, as if fearful of exposing his nose, said : " Make haste ; you will be too late for your lodging-tickets." We replied that we were fatigued, and soon afterwards, the rain increasing, they trotted on, repeating : " Make haste, make haste." We were not much flattered by the honour of their company, but not in such danger as one might imagine, for the road was between two woods, with a broad ditch on each side : had they stopped to dismount, we should instantly have jumped over and run into the wood, where no cavalry could have pursued. The rain continued to pour heavily, and having been completely soaked during many hours, at ten P. M. we held a council of war. Although such consultations have been termed the " bane of enterprise," it was not so with us, for the unanimity that prevailed not only rendered success more certain, but made each bear his individual privations with cheerfulness. After mature deliberation, we agreed to enter the town of Deynse, and to reconnoitre the low public-houses, in order to purchase provisions. We accordingly marched on. Whitehurst entered a house, which he found too full of company, and then a second, in which he saw four stupid-looking Flemings almost as wet as ourselves. Here we fortunately procured provisions without exciting suspicion, and then went on our way. Our route lay to the north-west ; and proceeding in this direction, we went on till dawn of the next day (Sunday.) We now entered a thick low wood, and here lay without disturbance basking in the rays of the sun, and listening to the church-bells, which summoned all good people to assemble. We would willingly have joined them had the church been so secure an asylum as the wood. As Whitehurst, with a praiseworthy and religious sense of the dangers he was about to encounter, had packed his prayer-book in his knapsack, and preserved it through all his disasters, we read prayers, and offered up our humble thanksgivings for deliverance from the hand of the enemy.

‘About sunset it began to rain again ; we quitted the wood, and proceeded to the westward, by a very bad road, frequently halting to rest, our feet being excessively tender. At about one A.M. we passed through a little village, and took shelter from a very heavy shower under a portico. At three, we crossed the high road to Bruges, near to a solitary public-house, in which no one could be seen but an old woman sitting by the fire, and, being again thoroughly wet, we entered and asked for refreshment. Many minutes had not passed when a Frenchman came in, baited his horse, and departed without addressing or taking the least notice of us. After regaling ourselves with eggs, and drying our clothes a little, we continued our march in the rain till nearly seven, then struck into a wood by the road-side, and fortified ourselves with leaves as before.

‘The rain fell in torrents during the whole day, with repeated showers of hail. Towards evening we proceeded by the main road, but it being very dark, could no longer direct our course by the stars. After dreadful fatigue we arrived about midnight at Bruges. Near the gates we observed a public-house ; and, having hitherto found such places to afford relief and safety at this hour of the night, we entered, and saw nobody but an old woman and a servant. At first they seemed somewhat surprised, but asked no questions except such as regarded our wants, frequently exclaiming, “Pauvres conscrits !” We dried our clothes, when the sudden transition from cold to heat split Hunter’s feet ; several of his nails also were loose, and Whitehurst had actually walked off two of his. The fire made us all so sensitive, that we could scarcely bear a foot to the floor, but found some relief by bathing them in oil. Having, however, enjoyed a comfortable supper, we lay down, keeping watch in turn, as before, until four A.M., when we paid the old woman, and departed.

round the town till break of day, we took refuge in a neighbouring wood, where we reposed until three in the afternoon, screened by dead leaves. This was the second fine day since our leaving Valenciennes ; and the sun, diffusing his genial influence throughout our frames, so renovated our strength, that we felt equal to the severest trials.

'At sunset the camp was again broken up, and, having had time during the day to consult the map, we marched directly to the bridge over the canal, doubled the town to the westward, and gained the road to the coast. Going in this direction, our object was to reach the village of Blankenberg on the coast, a few miles to the eastward of Ostend. At ten o'clock, passing a solitary public-house, we observed through the window an old man, two women, and a boy, sitting round a comfortable fire at supper. Hunter and I entered for the purpose of purchasing provisions to take on board any vessel we might be enabled to seize, being then about four miles from the sea. The woman of the house rose and stared at us, apparently alarmed at our entrance. We repeated our demand for provisions without obtaining a reply. Still gazing for a few seconds, regardless of our request, she rapturously exclaimed : "Ce sont des Anglais!" and immediately offered us chairs. Somewhat disconcerted at this unexpected reception, we again asked for refreshment. She insisted that we should partake of her fare, and assured us that not a creature should enter the house during our stay, if we would but sit down. We again refused, when she burst into a loud laugh, and ran to bar the door and window-shutters, at the same time directing the servant to fry more ham and eggs. We assured her it was useless ; nevertheless we remained, knowing there could be little danger, as Whitehurst and Mansell were on the look-out. During our most comfortable regale, she talked of nothing but her dear English, and dwelt particularly on the happiness of her former life, when in the service of an English family. She assured us that we should not be able to get off from Blankenberg that night. However, we departed. As we went out, she said : "Good-night, friends ; I shall see you again." Nothing but a thorough conviction of our being absconding prisoners of war, coupled with a sincere regard for the English, could have produced such conduct on her part. No sooner had we regained the road than our companions joined us.

'Continuing our march for the coast, we passed through a village about midnight, and stopped occasionally to listen with delight to the pleasing sound of the waves rolling over the beach, which, as we approached, created feelings of enjoyment that I had never before experienced. Between twelve and one, we entered the village of Blan-kenberg, which is protected from the sea by the sand-bank. Observing a gateway, apparently the road to the beach, I passed through to reconnoitre, leaving my companions in the street. To my great consternation, I found myself near a guard-house, and close to a sentry-box, from which I had the happiness to retreat unob-served. Proceeding through the village to the westward, and finding a footpath leading over the sand-bank, we ran down to the sea, forgetting our wounds, and exulting as though the summit of our wishes were attained, and we were on the point of embarkation. When our first transports had subsided, we saw with concern that the tide was at its lowest point. Our spirits, however, were not to be damped ; and, putting off the adventure to another night, we returned by the same path to the village, and bivouacked in an adjoining wood until day dawned, when Hunter and I proceeded to the public-house.

'Encouraged by our reception, we called in our com-rades, and all partook of a comfortable breakfast. This over, we offered a handsome sum, to be divided between our hostess and any boatman who would undertake to land us in England. The offer was not declined ; and meanwhile we were conducted to a hayloft, to take some repose.

'The hospitable roof which sheltered us was that of a cabaret or public-house, situated midway between Bruges and Blankenberg, known by the sign of "the Cat;" and being the house of police correspondence, it was visited at least three times a week by the gendarmes, consequently the less likely to be suspected. Having established ourselves in the hayloft, our obliging landlady examined and dressed our various wounds, which afforded us much relief. After dark, the servant-maid, named Cocher, and the dog Fox, being placed at the front-door to watch, we descended to partake of some broth; anxiously waiting the return of a messenger sent by Madame Derikre to Blankenberg for her confidential friend, a man named Winderkins. About nine, the boy came with intelligence that he was gone to Ostend, and that his wife would send him to "the Cat" on his return. We remounted into the loft, and slept as comfortably as the pain of our wounds would allow.

"The following evening Winderkins was introduced. He undertook, upon condition of sharing the reward, to find a fisherman who would either land us in England or put us on board an English man-of-war, and promised information on the subject the following day. In continual expectation of the happy hour of departure, we remained in our snug retreat, receiving frequent messages from Winderkins, until the 1st of December, when he appeared, and attributed his delay to the precautions necessary to be taken, and informed us that, having at length succeeded, we were to hold ourselves in readiness to depart that night. Soon after eight P.M., furnished with a few provisions, we quitted "the Cat," leaving with Madame Derikre bills to the amount of L.50, reserving the other L.50 for Winderkins and the boatmen. In an hour we reached Blankenberg, followed our guide down the beach to the eastward of the village, and concealed ourselves amongst the sand-hills, while he went to apprise the fisherman of our arrival. In this position we remained about two hours, Winderkins occasionally returning and desiring us to be particularly silent, there being several men on the beach, and the patrol on the alert. After a further absence of half an hour, he again returned, told us we must be patient, and postpone the event to the next night, the tide having then ebbed so as to leave the vessels high and dry. We returned to "the Cat," much to the surprise of Madame Derikre.

'This disappointment was but the first of a series, during which our patience was doomed to be tried to the utmost, owing to a complication of untoward circumstances. It was not till the 1st of March that our faithful ally Winderkins brought us the welcome intelligence that, as everything had been now so long quiet at Blankenberg, the vigilance of the guard was gradually relaxing, and the fishermen were neglecting to haul their vessels up, so that he was certain that the next spring-tide would float several. With heart elate, as in the moment of victory, on the night of the 4th of March we went to Blankenberg; reached the shore, seized on a boat, and had actually got the length of pushing off, when, in the attempt to fix the rudder, a noise was made which alarmed the sentinels in the fortress. Terrible was the disappointment; but there was no time to lose. We must instantly jump ashore, and make for the open fields. Seeing armed men approach, we made a resolute rush directly across, leaving our knapsacks and everything but the clothes on our backs in the vessel, and gained the summit just in time to slip over on the other side unseen. We ran along the hills towards the village about 100 yards, when, mistaking a broad ditch for a road, I fell in, but scrambled out on the opposite side. Mansell, who was close at my heels, thinking that I had jumped in on purpose, followed, which led the others to jump in also. Thus was the pursuit of the enemy unexpectedly cut off, and a safe retreat to "the Cat" providentially secured. We regained our head-quarters in less than an hour, and related this heart-rending disaster to Madame Derikre.

'In consequence of this alarm, and of our apprehension that it would lead to a strict search in the house and neighbourhood—which actually resulted—we now thought it prudent to quit our refuge in "the Cat," and betake ourselves, as we had so often done before, to the shelter of a wood, where our sufferings were most deplorable—wet to the skin, the extremities of our garments like solid boards of ice, and scarcely a shoe among us worthy the name. We found a hollow from which a tree had been dug, and laid a quantity of twigs in it, so as to form a dry bed. A horse-cloth, which we obtained from “the Cat,” was then spread loosely over, propped by a stick in the centre, and fastened down by pegs, and dead leaves strewed round the edge. Here we lay as in a kind of tent, in much comparative comfort. In the sequel, Mansell, the youngest of our party, was despatched, disguised as a girl, to Bruges, to an acquaintance of Mrs Derikre, who had already assisted her in favouring the escape of English prisoners. Through the agency of this person, Mansell was enabled to embark for England with a smuggler in an open boat fifteen feet in length, with the intention of returning to the coast and taking off his comrades by night.

‘In the beginning of April, we three who remained found, by means of the same friend, a place of secure concealment in Bruges, under the care of a man named Neirinks. The furniture of our room consisted of a table, four chairs, and a bedstead filled with clean straw. This, compared with the sticks and the dirty wet hole in the wood, was a luxury only to be appreciated by those who have experienced similar vicissitudes. Through Neirinks we bargained with the same smuggler who had taken Mansell to England, to convey us across the Channel, for which service he was to receive L.80.

‘Disguised as Flemish fishermen, we reached the coast in company of the smuggler, and took up our residence in his miserable hut, among the sand-hills, near the mouth of the Scheldt, opposite Flushing. Here we remained till the evening of the 8th of May, when, all preparations being safely made, we went on board a boat that was brought to the beach. The little craft gliding silently in-shore with muffled oars, we rushed into it, and in an instant were all safely afloat. Each seized an oar, and vigorously applying his utmost strength, we were soon beyond the range of shot.

'It would be in vain to attempt a faithful description of our feelings at this moment. The lapse of a few minutes had wrought such a change of circumstances that, amid a confusion of ideas, we could scarcely divest ourselves of the apprehensions which constant habit had ingrafted on our minds. Nor could we relinquish the oar, but continued at this laborious but now delightful occupation all through the night.

'When day dawned, the breeze freshened from the eastward, and as the sun arose, the wide expanse of ocean opened around us, and in the distant rear we beheld, with feelings of gratitude and triumph, the afflicted land of bondage whence we had escaped. We made rapid progress to the north-west. About noon, the wind still increasing, and the sea rising, we deemed it prudent to close-reef the sail. While thus scudding delightfully before the billows, which occasionally broke as if to overwhelm our little boat, only fifteen feet in length, every eye was fixed steadily ahead, anxious to be the first to discern land. It was not, however, till towards three P.M. that the white cliffs of England met our view. Full of joy as our situation already was, the first sight of our native shore after so long absence, coupled with the memory of perils overcome, afforded a compensation for all past sufferings. On falling in with a fishing-smack off the Goodwin Sands, the master welcomed us on board, and taking our boat in tow, ran for Ramsgate. Entering the harbour at five o'clock, I landed with such emotions of joy and gratitude, as it would be altogether impossible to describe. I had reached my native country after a captivity of nearly six years.'

So ended the narrative of Captain Boys, who, subsequently to his adventurous escape, had resumed his naval duties, and distinguished himself as a gallant officer. He called my attention to the following paragraph in the Times newspaper, by which it will be seen that the kind-hearted woman who had favoured his escape had many years survived the adventures in which the captain had been engaged :—

‘ Deceased, on the 20th inst. at Ostend, in her eighty-fourth year, Madame Derikre, who during the war assisted at different times fifteen British officers in their escape from France ; for which service she was incarcerated four years, and eventually liberated from the prison of Ghent by the Cossacks in 1814. During her latter years, she was comfortably provided for by one of the above party.’

TARDY, THE POISONER.

ACCORDING to the annals of courts of justice, it appears that two classes of offenders are brought to trial for their misdeeds—namely, those who commit crime from necessity, or some unfortunate combination of circumstances ; and those who are naturally or habitually so depraved in disposition, that no moral restraint has the power of preventing their commission of the most dreadful atrocities. To this latter class belonged Alexander Tardy, one of the most consummate villains whom the world ever produced, and whose career in crime may be read as a warning by those who have the power of suppressing vicious propensities in youth, while they are susceptible of modification.

Tardy was a native of the island of St Domingo, and accompanied his father, who was of French extraction, to the United States, where he sought refuge after the revolution of that island. It does not appear that he received anything like a good education, and it is mentioned that in youth he displayed an untamed, restless disposition. He was put to a mercantile business in Philadelphia, but in this he ultimately failed, and went to serve as steward on board a vessel. From this employment he was discharged in 1813, under the dark suspicion of having poisoned the captain. He now went to Boston, and got a knowledge of the business of a dentist from a German practitioner. After this, he committed a number of thefts, and having fled, while on board a vessel bound for Charleston, he poisoned some of the passengers, and had the audacity to charge the crime on the cook, a black man, who was tried and executed, although protesting his innocence to the last. On his return to Philadelphia, he practised the same horrid crime, by infusing arsenic in the food of the passengers ; but this time he did not altogether escape punishment, being seized and condemned to seven years' hard labour in one of the penitentiaries. From this state of confinement he was at length liberated, and for some years lived in the commission of almost every species of offence. He possessed the most unbounded confidence in his resources, and viewed mankind with the utmost contempt. He never hesitated for a moment to perpetrate a crime, even where there was a danger of being detected. In his creed, he seems to have proscribed the whole human race. Perjury, poison, and poniards, were his instruments, and he wielded all with equal dexterity ; but his chief engine of destruction was poison, which he never scrupled to use, and that in the most dexterous manner. In personal appearance, Tardy was a plain, neat man, of a dark complexion, and with a grave countenance, which, it is said, was never disturbed either by a smile or a laugh. He spoke several languages with fluency, which was an accomplishment that gave him only greater scope for the performance of his designs.

Finding that his character was too well known in the United States, he formed the plan of doing something in the way of slavedealer or pirate in the West Indies, and with such a view made his appearance, in 1827, at Havannah, in the island of Cuba. Here, while in the course of maturing his plans, he pretended to practise as a dentist and physician, in order to lull suspicion as to his real character. After spending some time in Havannah, he settled upon a plan which, if executed with discretion and energy, promised, as he thought, to yield a rich reward for his ingenuity. This was nothing less than murdering the whole crew and passengers of a vessel, and then making the ship his own, with all its valuable cargo. Such a diabolical scheme, however, could not be executed without accomplices, and these he found in the persons of Felix, Pepe, and Courro, three Spaniards of loose character, who had been accustomed to scenes of dissipation and crime. The vessel which was pitched upon by this band of wretches was the American brig Crawford, commanded by Captain Brightman, at the time loading with molasses, coffee, and sugar, and about to sail for New York. This selection, it seems, was not without a sufficient reason. The Crawford was a new vessel, and a slight indisposition of the captain led Tardy to expect that he might, in his professional character of doctor, gain his confidence, which would greatly facilitate the execution of his scheme. The mode of operation was now arranged. It was agreed that Courro should go on board in the capacity of Tardy's servant, and that Felix and Pepe should go as cabin-passengers, passing for merchants going to New York to buy a vessel to be employed in the African trade; and to render this story probable, a box was procured, filled with iron and lead, which was to be represented as containing seventeen thousand dollars in gold. In the meanwhile, by means of a discharged clerk of the custom-house, a set of false papers was procured, to exhibit after the vessel had been mastered.

After some delay in loading and taking on board a number of passengers, the good brig Crawford cleared out for sea on the 28th of May 1827. When it set sail, it was manned by the following crew:—Edmund Dobson, mate; Joseph Dolliver, Asa Bicknell, Oliver Potter, and Nathaniel Deane, seamen; and Stephen Gibbs, a coloured man, who acted as cook. Besides Brightman, the captain, there were also on board, as passengers, Tardy, Felix, Pepe, and Courro; likewise Ferdinand Ginoulhiac, who was also a Spaniard, but not belonging to Tardy's band; an American, and an Irish carpenter, whose names were not known; and Mr Norman Robinson, who was part owner of the cargo—making altogether fifteen individuals. We shall now describe how the plot was gradually developed, and brought to a crisis; and in doing so, use the affecting account afterwards given by Dobson, the mate, who, along with Ginoulhiac, and Gibbs, the cook, alone survived to tell the horrid tale.

'The brig,' says Dobson, 'proceeded on the voyage with variable winds, but with every prospect of making a fair passage. One morning, after the vessel had been at sea for a few days, the wind being light, and the weather fair, I sat down to breakfast on deck with Tardy and the other cabin-passengers. Captain Brightman was still indisposed, and confined to his berth. During breakfast, Tardy acted as master of the ceremonies, and helped me to bacon, fried eggs, and a bowl of chocolate—all which politeness, of course, excited no suspicion. Soon after breakfast, I descended to the cabin for the purpose of taking some repose, having been engaged all night on duty; but I had hardly lain down for a minute, when I was attacked with a violent headache, throbbing about the temples, and sickness of the stomach. Unable to make out the cause of this sudden illness, I sent for Tardy, who, having felt my pulse, and inquired into the symptoms of the disease, declared that there was bile on the stomach, and recommended an emetic. Mr Robinson having overheard this prescription, dissuaded me from taking any medicine whatever, and recommended repose. I therefore had my mattress removed to the open air on the deck, where I lay until eight o'clock in the evening, by which time the vomiting had ceased, and I felt a good deal relieved. During the day, I had a conversation with Mr Robinson, who communicated his fear that an attempt had been made by the Spaniards to poison them, as the whole crew seemed to be sick, and who proposed that, to guard against anything of this kind in future, their own cook should prepare food for the crew and other passengers, while Courro, who acted as the servant of Felix and Tardy, might act as cook for the Spaniards. Nothing, however, was settled upon definitely, and, as the vessel was going safely in her course, I lay down for the night, but with orders to be waked if the breeze should spring up.

'I had slept, I think, about an hour and a half, when I was waked by dreadful shrieks proceeding from all parts of the vessel. Starting up with the apprehension that we were boarded by pirates, I ran forward to the forecastle, and there a horrid scene of slaughter met my sight. I learned that Courro was the first to wake, and perceiving that the time was come for action, he called up Tardy and the Spaniards. Tardy then cut the throat of Dolliver, and gave the signal, when the Spaniards set up dreadful cries, which roused everybody; and as any one came up, either from the cabin or forecastle, he was immediately stabbed. The American carpenter was the first to make his way from the cabin, and was stabbed by Pepe; but the blow not proving mortal, a struggle ensued, which lasted for a short time, when he fell, and was despatched by an axe. During the continuance of this struggle, Captain Brightman rushed on deck, and received a blow from Felix, which laid him prostrate. The Irish passenger met the same fate, and Robinson was supposed to have thrown himself from the cabin windows into the ocean, upon seeing the death of the Irishman. Courro was equally successful at the forecastle, and stabbed successively Potter, Gibbs, and Bicknell; Deane, who slept on deck, was not discovered in the darkness, and threw himself overboard without being wounded. When in the water, he entreated that a barrel, plank, or oar, or something might be thrown out to support him, as he was ready to sink, and these entreaties were seconded by Mr Robinson, but all in vain; and they both, doubtless, soon sank to rise no more.' [Gibbs, the black cook, who had been wounded, and Mr Ginoulhiac, were spared; why the latter was not put to death, is not well explained in the evidence.]

'In the meantime, being wounded, I had made the best of my way to the rigging, which had not escaped the notice of Tardy, who called out in a loud voice for me to descend, which I refused to do ; but upon repeated assurances, that if I came down my life would be spared, I at length ventured down upon the deck, and was immediately surrounded by Tardy and his companions. Tardy now began to question me about the box which Felix had brought aboard, and what had become of it. I replied, that I had seen the box, and put it in the captain's state-room, but could not tell what had become of it, if it were no longer there. Tardy then explained, that the Spaniards had applied to the captain for the box, and upon his refusal to give it up, they had resolved, instead of going to the United States to seek a precarious redress from the laws, to take the law into their own hands, and had accordingly killed the captain and taken possession of the vessel ; that, as the deed was now done, it would be useless to go to the United States, and they had determined to sail for Europe ; and that, if I would assist them, they would not only save my life, but I should be well paid for my services when the cargo was disposed of.

' Of course, this plausible story of Tardy was a mere fabrication, in order to excuse the murders and the seizure of the vessel ; but as I was not in a condition to dispute the accuracy of the statement, I offered no objections to it, and consented to do that which was requested of me, whereupon I obtained permission to lie down on my mattress to take some repose. In the course of the morning, after the work of destruction had been completed, the Spaniards set up loud cries of exultation, and intoxicated with their success, walked about the deck, which, as well as the sails and rigging, was everywhere dyed with blood, and they occasionally resorted to a bottle of liquor placed on the hen-coop. They were not, however, so far gone as to neglect the clearing away of all traces of the murders. They washed the deck and rigging, and painted the sails, to conceal the blood with which they were stained. During the day, all the papers belonging to the brig were torn up and thrown overboard, and all the chests and trunks which had belonged to the passengers and crew were ransacked for plunder. The

' Tardy, who was now in command; informed me that he intended to proceed to Hamburg, and that he was provided with papers for such a voyage ; but that before sailing for Europe, he wished to put into some port to procure fresh provisions, and ship a crew, as the Spaniards were no sailors. At his request, I informed him how to steer for St Mary's. An effort was now made to reach this port, but contrary winds prevented a landing ; and after cruising about for a couple of days, I proposed to carry the vessel either into Savannah or Charleston : Tardy, however, objected to these places, where he said he was known, and he did not care for being seen. It was finally resolved to go to Norfolk, and the course was accordingly shaped for the Capes of Virginia. Tardy proposed that they should anchor in the Chesapeake, and remain there while he went to Norfolk and procured hands and provisions. This I opposed, telling him that I was afraid of the Spaniards, who would probably take my life. He did all in his power to remove these fears, by saying, that if they attempted my life, he would sink both them and the vessel on his return. Circumstances fortunately occurred to prevent him from leaving the vessel, and my running any risk of being murdered. On arriving at the bay of Norfolk, pilot-boats began, as is usual, to make their appearance, a matter which disconcerted him not a little. As one pilot after another came up and offered his services, Tardy declined their offers, declaring that the vessel was bound for Hamburg, and that he was well acquainted with the bay. I now pointed out the danger of his refusing to take a pilot ; that the refusal might excite suspicion, especially as the name of the vessel was not on the stern ; and these representations induced him to allow a pilot to come on board.'

This was a fatal though an unavoidable step, and paved the way for the discovery of the piracy and murder. Having come to anchor by the guidance of the pilot at about a hundred yards from the shore, Tardy again mentioned his intention to go on shore to get hands and provisions, making strong promises to Dobson to reward him for his fidelity, and to bring him anything he wanted from Norfolk : but Dobson had already formed a plan of escape from this band of wretches. He had the address to persuade Tardy to allow him to prepare the boat for his going ashore ; and getting possession of an oar, while the Spaniards were aloft furling the sails, he at once sculled away from the vessel, and, to the consternation of Tardy, got safely to land. On touching the shore, he made the best of his way to Fortress Monroe, and gave information to the officers of the character of the vessel, and the dreadful transactions of which it had been the scene. A boat was forthwith fitted out with an officer and men to visit the ship, and seize Tardy and his companions.

In the interim, the wretched Tardy foresaw the termination which was speedily to take place to his murderous career. He saw the vengeance of the law about to fall upon him, and he hastened to elude his fate. Proceeding to the cabin, and seating himself upon a box of dollars, the accumulation of his plunder, he put an end to his existence by cutting his throat. The Spaniards had not the same clear porception of the nature of their doom, and suffered themselves to be seized, and carried on shore to prison. The ship was now taken charge of by the official authorities ; the remaining persons on board—namely, Mr Ginoulhiac and the cook—being at the same time removed, and kept along with Dobson as witnesses on the trial of the Spanish sailors.

The trial took place before Chief-Justice Marshall, at Richmond, Virginia, on the 16th of July 1827, and the evidence of the guilt of the prisoners was so clear, that they were condemned to death, and were executed a month afterwards.

As soon as the tale of horror which we have narrated became generally known, a very considerable degree of interest was manifested with regard to the configuration of the head of the principal actor, Tardy ; and his skull was therefore made the object of measurement and analysis, in order to see if it corresponded with the principles laid down by phrenology. For the special results of these examinations, we must refer to the 5th volume of the Edinburgh Phrenological Journal: it is sufficient for us here to state, that the skull of Tardy was found to be low in front, shewing a deficiency of moral and intellectual faculties, and a large preponderance behind, proving a predominance of the destructive and grovelling propensities of our nature. Possibly, these might have been modified by early culture, along with the inculcation of moral and religious sentiments: as it was, the whole career of the man offers one of the most striking instances in modern times, of a human being devoting himself, under every circumstance of life, to the destruction of his fellow-creatures.

THE FUR-TRADE.

OUR readers are most probably aware, that the furs with which the British and European markets are supplied, are chiefly brought from North America. When Canada was a province of France, the colonists of that nation carried on an extensive and lucrative fur-trade, and the British, eager to participate in so advantageous a traffic, established, so early as the year 1670, a company, termed the Hudson's Bay Company, which exists under the same name till the present day, and has always possessed a large share of the traffic. Numerous other companies have sprung up from time to time with the same views; of which the North-West, the North American, and the Columbian Companies, have been the most important and successful. In all these establishments, the natives of America are the principal collectors of the furs, which they barter for arms, and such other commodities as civilised nations can alone manufacture.

It would be useless to enter into the particular history of these several companies. Only two, indeed, properly speaking, now exist—the Hudson's Bay Company having been of late years incorporated with the North-West one. The shareholders of this establishment are almost all of them British merchants, resident in London. With respect to the other companies, the North American was composed of a body of New York merchants, and the Columbian likewise was supported by the inhabitants of the United States. The latter of these companies confined its operations to the Mississippi and St Peter's River; while the American Company held possession of the trade on the Upper Mississippi, Missouri, and the great lakes. After existing separately for many years, these establishments were united, and still continue so. The Hudson's Bay Company, again, as its name implies, trades in the more northern regions of the New World, occupying, with its numerous branches and stations, the whole range of country between the lakes and the Arctic Sea. Private adventurers and smaller firms are to be found, besides, engaged in many quarters in the fur-trade, but it can only be carried on efficiently by an enlarged combination both of men and capital. It is from this cause, rather than from privileges and charters, that the large companies have always enjoyed a monopoly, which smaller associations, rising now and then, could never disturb.

Lord Selkirk and Sir Alexander Mackenzie have both left full descriptions, from personal observation, of the manner in which the details of fur-dealing are conducted; and though some time has elapsed since these accounts were written, the plan of operations continues unchanged till the present hour. During Sir Alexander's connection with the trade in Canada, the North-West Company were in the habit of penetrating to the great distance of 4000 miles to the westward of Montreal. In the service of the establishment were 50 clerks, 71 interpreters, and 1120 canoe-men. A great number of these individuals were Indians, or half-breeds; and their wives and children, who generally accompany the expeditions, amounted to about 700 persons. This great body of people embarked every spring, in different divisions, in slight canoes of bark, upon rivers newly freed from the ice, and coursed along them, encountering at every step difficulties and dangers, from rocks, rapids, and other natural obstacles. The slender boats were always heavily laden with provisions for the party, and goods of various kinds, particularly arms and clothing, to exchange for the furs. On reaching Lake Superior, where the company had their chief winter-stations, the expedition met parties who had spent the winter there, engaged in collecting the furs, and two months were spent in the settlement of debts and other affairs. The furs were then packed in August, and embarked in a portion of the canoes for Montreal; while the remainder proceeded, with the articles necessary for the traffic, to different posts in the Indian country, there to remain in log-huts for the winter, and collect a fresh stock of skins. Sir Alexander Mackenzie spent many years of his life in this employment, and made those discoveries respecting the geography of the regions to the north-west of the lakes, which revived the prospect of a north-west passage.

The purposes to which the different kinds of skins are put are exceedingly various, only a few of them being actually used as furs in clothing. Beaver-skins, for example, are in this country devoted now-a-days almost entirely to the manufacture of hats. One portion, besides, of an animal's fur, is applied to purposes which the remainder is inapplicable to; and hence, in order to distinguish these different parts of the same animal's skin, new names are often bestowed on them. Thus the furs best known and most valued in this country are ermine, lynx, sable, fitch, American squirrel, chinchilla, and silver-bear—some of which are derived from animals mentioned in Sir Alexander Mackenzie's list, while others are from animals which do not appear to have been then in use in the trade. Of all these furs, ermine is the finest, and one of the most expensive. A skin, purely white in the body, and black at the end of the tail, is considered as of the best quality. Many attempts, of course, are made to imitate ermine by dyeing inferior skins. Fitch, sable, and lynx, are the most durable of furs, and bear a high value. The squirrel and chinchilla furs are exceedingly elegant, but do not last very long. They are of a grayish tint. Fine bear-skins are of great value in the fur-trade, and are manufactured into articles of much beauty as well as durability. It ought to be mentioned, that the fur companies trade extensively in buffalo-skins, though no furs are derived from any animal of that class. An immense number of animals of other kinds are also frequently killed in the arctic regions, the bodies of which serve as food to the hunting-parties. - A party of 80 men killed and consumed, in one winter, 90,000 white partridges and 25,000 hares. The friths and shores of Hudson's Bay are stocked with the grampus, seal, narwhal, sea-horse, and other creatures, of which many hundreds are killed annually, and their skins, particularly those of the seal-tribe, added to the general store. As the killing goes on continually, there is an annual supply of furs in the British market. We shall now explain the consequences of this trade to the natives, or Indians, as they are termed, of the northern regions of America. They are the principal hunters of the animals whose skins are used, though those servants of the fur companies, who spend the winter in remote log-stations, are continually engaged likewise in this pursuit. Next to guns, hatchets, knives, powder, and other hunting-implements, the articles coveted by the Indians are coarse blue and red cloth, and fine scarlet, coarse cottons, hoes, beads, vermillion, ribbons, kettles, &c. The course of a private trader to the North-West is thus given in the American Encyclopædia (article, Fur-Trade), and we fear that the remarks made regarding the effects of the intercourse on the natives are but too true :—“ The trader starts from Michilimackinac, or St Louis, late in the summer, with a Mackinac boat, laden with goods. He takes with him an interpreter, commonly a half-breed, and four or five engagées (boatmen or servants.) On his arrival at his wintering-ground, his men build a store for the goods, an apartment for him, and another for themselves. These buildings are of rough logs, plastered with mud, and roofed with ash or linden slabs. The chimneys are of clay ; and though these habitations are rude in appearance, there is much comfort in them. This done, the trader gives a great portion of his merchandise to the Indians on credit. These credits are from 20 to 200 dollars in amount, according to the reputation of the applicant as a hunter. It is expected that the debtor will pay in the following spring, though, as many neglect this part of the business, the trader is compelled to rate his goods very high. Thus the honest pay for the dishonest. The skins are dried with care, being occasionally exposed to the sun, and rubbed with salt and alum, to keep the hair attached. This is partly done by the natives, and partly by the purchasers. Ardent spirits were never much used among the remote tribes. It is on the frontier, and in the immediate vicinity of the white settlers, that the Indians get enough to do them physical injury ; though, in the interior, the traders, in the heat of opposition, employ strong liquors to induce the savages to commit outrage, or to defraud their creditors. By this means, the moral principle of the aborigines is overcome, and often eradicated. Spirit is commonly introduced into their country in the form of high wines, they being less bulky, and easier of transportation, than liquors of lower proof. Indians, after having once tasted, become extravagantly fond of them, and will make any sacrifice, or commit any crime, to obtain them. An interpreter is necessary to a fur-trader, whether he speaks the language of the tribe with which he deals or not. It is the duty of an interpreter to take charge of the house, and carry on the business in the absence of the principal. He also visits the camps, and watches the debtors. In the prairie regions, dog-sledges are used for the transportation of skins and goods in winter. The sledge is merely a flat board turned up in front like the runner of a sleigh. The dogs are harnessed and driven tandem, and their strength and powers of endurance are very great.'

The same writer goes on to remark: 'The fur-trade demoralises all engaged in it. The way in which it operates on the Indians has been already partially explained. As to the traders, they are generally ignorant men, in whose breasts interest overcomes religion and morals. As they are beyond the reach of the law, at least in the remote regions, they disregard it, and often commit or instigate actions which they would blush to avow in civilised society. In consequence of the fur-trade, the buffalo has receded hundreds of miles beyond his former haunts. Formerly, an Indian killed a buffalo, made garments of the skin, and fed on the flesh: now, he finds that a blanket is lighter and more convenient than a buffalo robe, and kills two or three animals with whose skins he may purchase it. To procure a gun, he must kill ten. The same causes operate to destroy the other animals. Some few tribes hunt on the different parts of their grounds alternately, and so preserve the game, but by far the greater part of the aborigines have no such regulations.'

Regarding the evils of competition in the fur-trade, Lord Selkirk relates many circumstances strongly corroborative of the observations just quoted. When the North-West Company was threatened with the competition of a new establishment, the murder of a gentleman belonging to the latter was actually traced to the instigation of the European or white servants of the old firm. Competition, however, has now in a great measure ceased, and it is to be hoped that the evils referrible to it have died with it. The American Company and the Hudson's Bay Company have the trade now in a great measure to themselves, and their business lies in quarters so far asunder, that their rivalry can produce no mischief.

The animals which supply the furs used in the civilised world, are certainly becoming every year more scarce. The plan followed by some of the native tribes, of hunting in different grounds every season, is the only one, if it could be followed, capable of preserving a supply. Private trading would be a great obstacle to this, were there no other.

F R A N C I S C H A N T R E Y .

THE father of Chantrey was a small farmer near Sheffield. He died when his son was only twelve years of age. His mother seems to have had little respect for herself or the memory of her husband, for when she was but a few months a widow, she married one of her own farm-servants. This step greatly outraged the feelings of young Chantrey, who would never call his mother by her new name. To get rid of the youth, he was placed as a shopboy with a grocer in Sheffield; but disliking this profession, he was, after a few weeks, removed from behind the grocer's counter, and apprenticed to Robert Ramsay, a carver and gilder, the artistic attractions of whose window had fixed the attention of the lad. Francis began his apprenticeship in 1797, when he was sixteen years old.

Chantrey was now in a sphere which admitted of the cultivation of certain tastes with which he felt himself inspired. Besides being a carver in wood, his master was a dealer in prints and plaster-models, and these Chantrey at once set about imitating. It will here be observed, that in doing so he necessarily encroached on his private time. There was no call on him, in point of duty to his employer, to become either a draughtsman or a sculptor. Like hundreds of apprentice lads, he might just have done the work put before him, and consumed the remainder of his time in sleep and amusement. But Chantrey possessed the desire to improve his abilities, and his self-denial, patience, and industry at this period of his life, led the way to future renown.

'In Ramsay's shop,' to follow a good summary of his biography in the Times newspaper, ‘Chantrey copied the prints, worked at the carvings, cleaned pictures, and tried his ‘prentice hand as a modeller upon the face of a fellow-workman. He did more. At a trifling expense, he hired a small room, to which he retired to spend every hour he could call his own in modelling and drawing. “It was often midnight,” writes his biographer, Mr Holland, “before he came home; but neither master nor servant ever suspected he had been anywhere but in his obscure studio, drawing, modelling, or poring over anatomical plates.” He was still an apprentice when he made the acquaintance of Jonathan Wilson, the medal-engraver. In the old High Street of Sheffield was a low gloomy shop, called “Woollen’s Circulating Library.” “In a back chamber of these premises,” Mr Holland informs us, “night by night, towards the close of his apprenticeship, did young Chantrey and his friend Wilson devote themselves to the pencil, their principal exercise being to copy the drapery of a series of French prints of statuary.” Subsequently, meeting Mr Raphael Smith, “the distinguished draughtsman in crayon,” at his master’s house, and growing impatient of wood-carving, Chantrey induced Mr Ramsay to cancel his indentures two years before his term of apprenticeship expired. A friend advanced £.50 to effect his release, and freedom being obtained, Chantrey, then in his twenty-first year, made the best of his way to London. Reaching that scene of his future greatness, he called immediately upon an uncle and aunt, both living in the service of Mrs D’Oyley, in Curzon Street, Mayfair, and that lady, much to her credit, gave the young artist a room over her stable to work in, and requested his uncle to see him daily supplied with a necessary knife and fork.

‘At Mrs D’Oyley’s, Chantrey was still a man-of-all-work —cleaning the pictures in that lady’s house, and occupying himself now with painting and now with sculpture, yet doubtful as to which pursuit he should finally and exclusively devote his powers. A very few months after taking up his residence in Mayfair, we find the active youth back in Sheffield upon a flying professional visit, making the most of his advantages at this as at every later period of his life. Mr Holland has fished from the Sheffield Iris of April 22, 1802, a characteristic advertisement referring to this artistic speculation, much too good to be lost:—

“ F. Chantrey, with all due deference, begs permission to inform the ladies and gentlemen of Sheffield and its vicinity, that during his stay here he wishes to employ his time in taking of portraits in crayons and miniatures, at the pleasure of the person who shall do him the honour to sit. F. C., though a young artist, has had the opportunity of acquiring improvement from a strict attention to the works and productions of Messrs Smith, Arnold, & Co., gentlemen of eminence. He trusts in being happy to produce good and satisfactory likenesses; and no exertion shall be wanting on his part to render his humble efforts deserving some small share of public patronage. Terms —from two to three guineas. 24 Paradise Square.”

The advertiser was not without custom. Indeed, Sheffield had patronised his exertions in this direction before, and Mr Holland enumerates as many as seventy-two portraits still to be found in Sheffield and the neighbourhood, all painted by Chantrey before he forsook the brush for the chisel. Among the seventy-two are portraits of Chantrey’s old schoolmaster; of James Montgomery, the poet; of an old man, whose canvas announces that the work is “done by Francis Chantrey, a self-taught youth, of Norton parish;” of a cutler, who paid Chantrey the first guinea he received for the exercise of his pencil; and of an ambitious confectioner, who gave the artist £.5 and a pair of top-boots! for a likeness “in oil, of the brownish tint, rather tamely executed.”

Two years elapsed from the first visit to Sheffield, and Chantrey had made sufficient progress in sculpture to justify a more ambitious appeal to the patronage of his fellow-townsmen. The Sheffield Iris of October 18, 1804, is again the vehicle of his humble petition for work. Thus runs the advertisement:—

ladies and gentlemen of Sheffield and its environs in the above arts, during the recess of the Royal Academy, which he hopes to merit from the specimen he has to offer to their attention at his apartments, No. 14 Norfolk Street. As models from life are not generally attempted in the country, F. C. hopes to meet the liberal sentiments of an impartial public."

'There were Sheffield gentlemen ready to be done in plaster, as there had been cutlers and confectioners willing to be immortalised in oils. Moreover, there was a laudable desire to push native talent, and Chantrey was fairly taken by the hand by the men of Sheffield. A correspondent of a local journal called attention to the genius which Providence had unexpectedly raised in the land of hardware, and the first opportunity was seized to bring its capability publicly to the test. A monument was to be raised to the memory of the late vicar of Sheffield in 1805, and Chantrey, then twenty-four years old, was selected for the work. So successful was the artist on this occasion, that Montgomery, in alluding to his achievement, prophesied that "his genius would not only confer celebrity on the little village of Norton, the place of his birth, but reflect glory on his native country itself." Three years after this performance, Chantrey sent for exhibition to Sheffield "a gigantic head of Satan," modelled in the room over the stable in Mayfair, and remarkable not only as an indication of the sculptor's powers, but as the harbinger of all his subsequent success. Flaxman, who had seen and admired this head at the Exhibition of the Royal Academy, recommended Chantrey for the execution of the busts of four admirals required for the Naval Asylum at Greenwich. This commission led immediately to others. Painting was given up. The professional visits to Sheffield were also abandoned: no further advertisements were inserted in the Sheffield Iris. Chantrey married, and received substantial coin with his wife. Mrs D'Oyley's butler was comfortably warm in respect to the things of this life, and when he gave his daughter to his nephew, he added a sum sufficient to enable the latter to build himself a studio, and to take a position worthy of his prospects. From first to last, Chantrey received of his wife's money considerably more than £10,000; and of all artists that ever lived, Chantrey knew best how to turn such gifts of fortune to good account.

' Francis Chantrey, like Byron, rose one morning and found himself famous. In the year 1811, he had six busts in the exhibition; and one of these was the head of Horne Tooke, which brought commissions, according to Chantrey's own account, amounting to £12,000.

' In 1811, over fifteen competitors, Chantrey was selected to execute a statue of George III. for the city of London. From that year until 1817, he commanded in his profession. By universal consent, he was allowed to be unequalled in his time as a modeller of busts; and nothing, indeed, can surpass the force, the truthfulness, and simplicity of these works. In 1817, he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy; and from this period, until his death in 1841, he pursued a most successful and profitable career, having been engaged to execute busts in marble of many distinguished individuals, besides other figures. As is well known, he was assisted in executing the details of some of his best sculptures by Allan Cunningham. It is matter for surprise, that Chantrey should have done so much and conducted himself so properly, considering personal and other deficiencies. His vision was very imperfect. Of the right eye, he had no use whatever; yet he was an excellent shot. Of reading, he had none. His education had been of the very humblest, yet no one would have accused him of ignorance on any matter. He had surprising tact, a singular faculty of observation, admirable facility of acquiring knowledge in his daily walks, and perfect skill in concealing his poverty. He was brought up, the son of a working-man, first in a poor cottage, then in a carver's shop; but he was at ease in the society of princes, and his manner was as far removed from obsequious flattery as from vulgar rudeness. He had a fine and frank independence, which endeared him to his inferiors, and gave dignity to his professional character in the eyes of those above him.

Chantrey's career ceases to be in any way exemplary, from the time he acquired wealth and distinction. He became avaricious—eager for commissions; and it is alleged that so worldly were his feelings, that he never entered the door of a place of public worship. Of what use, it may be said, were his great acquisitions?—had he struggled from the first only to make money? It is, however, pleasing to have to say, that in the bequest of his large fortune, he aimed at the future encouragement of art. In his will, Chantrey provided that the whole of his effects, ‘amounting, we believe, to L.90,000, should, at the decease of his widow, become the property of the Royal Academy, for the purpose of purchasing “works of fine art of the highest merit in painting and sculpture,” but only such as shall have been entirely executed “within the shores of Great Britain;” the “wish and intention” of the artist being, “that the works of art so purchased shall be collected for the purpose of forming and establishing a public national collection of British art in painting and sculpture.” One or two minor bequests are of a curious nature. As a mark of his regard for the long services of his old lieutenant, Allan Cunningham, Chantrey stipulated in his will that the latter should be entitled to receive a legacy of L.2000, upon his superintending the completion of the Wellington statue. Allan attended to the important work up to the day of his death, but he died before the statue was completed, and—whatever may have been the intentions of the testator—his family lost the money. Another bequest was a gift of L.50 per annum, “to be paid to a schoolmaster, under the direction of the vicar or resident clergyman, to instruct ten poor boys of the parish of Norton, without expense to their parents;” but the condition of the legacy was the perpetuation of the donor's tomb. Mr Holland, says the writer in the Times, ‘gives no explanation of this somewhat unusual proviso; but it is worth recording nevertheless. Many years before his decease, Chantrey attended at St Martin's-in-the-Fields, with a friend, the funeral of Scott, who was shot in the duel with Christie. The grave-yard was strewed with human bones, and the grave-digger was adding indiscriminately and irreverently to the heaps. Chantrey inquired of the sexton what eventually became of those last remains of mortality. The sexton replied with a smile, that when they grew too plentiful, they were carted off in loads to the Thames. The friend described the effect of this answer upon the frame of Chantrey as painful in the extreme. His cheeks grew sickly white, and perspiration poured down them. At the moment, he looked himself a corpse newly risen from the grave before him. "I will take care," he said with a shudder, "that they do not cart my bones to the Thames. They shall be undisturbed under my native sod." And accordingly, there are £.5 per annum for ten poor boys of the village of Norton, so long as they will remember industriously to pluck the weeds and to remove the nettles that deface the grave-stone of Francis Chantrey. The sculptor subsequently paid a formal visit to Norton, and carefully selected the spot for his last resting-place. While looking for it, he encountered the grave-digger, who approached him, mattock on shoulder. "I am looking out a place for a grave," said Chantrey, "but I don't mean you to dig it." "I hope I shall," replied the grave-digger quietly and civilly: and it is likely enough that he did, for within a year the renowned sculptor was deposited near the humbler family dust that had mingled with the earth before him.

THE OLD WAY OF LIVING IN SCOTLAND.

Now that Scotland is so generally Anglicised, altered, and improved in various ways, it is curious to look upon a period when the style of living was almost entirely different—when, as yet, it retained the stamp of its ancient and peculiar character. Besides satisfying curiosity, there may be a use in a retrospect of this kind; for it will enable us to compare the past with the present, and say whether the times are really better or worse. For various reasons, therefore, we propose to give a glance at the way of living formerly prevalent in Scotland.

BURGHAL POPULATION.

Some notion of the style of living in a country town of the better order, eighty to a hundred years ago, may be acquired from a work published under the title of Traditions of Perth, by George Penny;* which, though written in an unpretending manner, will be found to contain much curious matter.

'The dress of the working-classes was wont to be of a very coarse fabric, commonly hoddern gray;† and the broad blue bonnet was universal. The cut of a fashionable coat of former days differed considerably from our ideas of elegance. This important article of dress was made with a very long waist, and gradually widened as it came down to the haunches; the tails were short, and spread round in front of the thighs; the sleeves were very wide, with immense cuffs folding back nearly to the elbows, and were ornamented with a profusion of very large buttons. Neither coat nor waistcoat had any neck, and the shirt was merely secured at the neck by a button—very few, except on holidays, indulging in the extravagant luxury of wearing a neckcloth. The waistcoat was an important and substantial article of dress, and, at a pinch, might have stood in place of a whole wardrobe. It descended nearly to the knees, parting at the top of the thighs into what were called flaps, each of which contained a pocket so capacious, as might lead to the idea that the worthy owners were in the habit of carrying their whole movables about with them. The breeches were very short, extending from the knee to the haunches, upon which they hung without the aid of braces. The stockings were a stout, and generally home-made article, produced by the females of the family. Many aged people, who had become incapable of more active employment, procured a living by knitting stockings. The hair was worn long, flowing over the shoulders.

'The common every-day dress of the women consisted of coarse blue plaiding petticoats, and a short-gown of the same. The married women wore a close mutch, which on Sundays they ornamented with some showy ribbons. Their Sunday-dress was composed of linsey-woolsey, which was chiefly spun in the family, and given out to weave.

'The young unmarried women wore their hair tied round with a ribbon or snood. The plaid, brought over the head, served the purpose of a bonnet. In the matter of female dress, there existed, as at present, a considerable diversity.

'The dress of the more wealthy was fashioned as above described, but of finer stuff; to which was added a huge wig, decorated with numerous rows of curls, and a large toupee in front; the whole surmounted by a magnificent cocked-hat; so that when the respectables appeared abroad, with a long pike-staff in their hand, reaching to about a foot above their head, or a gold-headed cane of similar length, their shoes and knees sparkling with immense silver buckles, they had a very consequential, though somewhat grotesque appearance.

'The ladies and matrons were very particular about their dress. The gowns, which were of silk or brocade patterns, were very long in the waists, with long flowing trains, which were generally tucked up all round. High-heeled shoes with silver buckles were the fashion. The hair was so dressed as to stand exceedingly high, if not upon end, and was covered with a fine lawn head-dress, with lappets and pinners, which hung down from the back of the head. About the year 1775, haunch-hoops were greatly in vogue among the better classes; and the haut ton wore them round the skirts, of a diameter so great, that before a lady could enter a ball-room, she had to raise the one side of her hoop as high as the head, and let the other come in towards her, to enable her to pass the doorway. Old men wore grammaches above their stockings, which were drawn up above the breeches to the middle of the thigh, and were fastened below by a flap coming forward on the foot, under the buckle of the shoe. The shoes or slippers of the beaux were made so low, that little more than their toes were protected by the instep; and this was completely covered by a plated buckle.

'The lasses in those days, instead of being brought up to the piano, were taught the management of an instrument equally soothing, and generally much more agreeable to the head of the family—namely, the spinning-wheel. As the whole of the household linen, as well as blankets, were home-made, a good supply of these articles was a matter of honest pride with the mother and daughters of a family.

'The furniture in the houses of the working-classes was not only scanty, but of a very humble description. The bed was generally formed in a recess, with doors in front, and boarded round. Being often shut up, and difficult to clean, they were very unhealthy; and soon became the stronghold of such numerous colonies of intruders, that the only effectual expedient to get rid of these nocturnal visitants was to burn them out, by throwing the wood-work to the street, and making a bonfire of it. There was another common sort of bed, with four short posts, and wooden bottom. This, though of a rude appearance, was a much more healthy couch than the former. Two chairs, and a couple of rude stools, a large buffet-stool for a table, together with a spinning-wheel, completed the leading articles of furniture. A heather-besom was the usual implement for cleaning their houses—washing them being seldom thought of. The greater part of the low-built houses had earthen-floors; and in wet weather, or when water was accidentally spilt upon them, they were very disagreeable. The houses of the middle-classes, although better furnished, were still but mean. Even the higher class of merchants had few of those conveniences now so generally diffused among all ranks of society. Carpets were a luxury known but to a few, and this only for the parlour. There was always a bed in the kitchen, and often three beds in one sleeping-apartment. The houses of common labourers and tradesmen consisted of a single room, and as there was no cellar attached, they were rendered more dirty and uncomfortable than they otherwise might have been. One room paid a rent of from 20s. to 25s. a year; two rooms and a closet were let for about 50s.; and the largest flat for about £.8 or £.10.

‘From what has been already stated, it is not to be supposed that the inhabitants were very cleanly, either in their household arrangements, in their habits, or their dress. Shoes were seldom cleaned but on Saturday night, when it was necessary to soften them with oil or grease. In some country places, brogues were made of undressed leather, secured with thongs instead of thread. These were by no means waterproof; but this was of little consequence, as the wearer had frequently to steep his brogues to keep them supple.

‘We frequently hear the “good old times” so highly praised, that one might be led to suppose that our ancestors lived at their ease, without labour or care, and fared sumptuously every day. The real state of the case, however, was very different. In the middle of the last century, the labouring-classes lived very poorly. The breakfast consisted of oatmeal porridge or brose, with skimmed milk or ale ; their dinner usually of water-kail—that is, green-kail and other vegetables boiled with field-peas and groats, barley not being then in use. Nettles were frequently used instead of greens. Pease-bannocks were eaten with this mess, to add nourishment to the meal. The supper consisted of sowans or brose. Occasionally a little flesh-meat was procured for the Sabbath-day. There is a local proverb, “As auld’s the Muirton kail,” the origin of which is now almost forgotten. It arose from some miserly farmer in this quarter being in the continual practice of adding the remains of the one day’s kail to the next day’s pottage. A dispute arising on the subject between him and his servants, it was proved in court that the kail or broth was seven years old. Brochan, or thick gruel, was rather a favourite supper, and was also often taken to dinner. During the salmon-fishing season, the backbones of the fish, which were extracted in preparing them for the London market, supplied a grateful addition to the dinner-table of a great portion of the inhabitants. Although most families had a garden, yet little else was cultivated than green-kail. These were in daily use, and formed a principal ingredient in the celebrated Scottish dish of kail-brose. This mess was prepared by pouring a quantity of kail upon a cog of oatmeal. It was truly a coarse repast. The more wealthy breakfasted on porridge, dined on broth and meat, and took porridge to supper. There was generally an addition of bread and cheese, or cold meat, to the morning meal.

‘About the year 1760, bakers only heated their ovens twice a week ; as loaf-bread was never used by the bulk of the people, their principal business lay in baking oatcakes ; the practice being to return so many cakes for each peck of meal brought in, the surplus being a perquisite to the bakers’ men, who disposed of it to customers of their own.’ Another kind of homely bread in these times, was the bannock—a thick unleavened cake, formed of a mixture of pease and barley meal, or of one of these ingredients alone. Fired on an iron girdle, bannocks, of whatever species, were a heavy and coarse, though not unwholesome article of diet. Few changes are more remarkable, than that from oat-cakes and bannocks, to the wheaten-bread of the baker.

In these ‘good old times,’ no fresh meat was eaten in winter, from the want of subsistence at that season for sheep and cattle; turnips and artificial grasses being as yet unknown. It was therefore customary to lay in a mart, as it was called, or stock of salted flesh sufficient for the winter’s supply. ‘This was generally done by a number of families joining for an ox, and dividing the carcass according to their wants. By this means it was procured rather cheaper, costing them about three-halfpence a pound. But the superior advantages which the regular dealer now affords the public, of a fresh supply at all times, and a choice of quality and price, have entirely done away with the old system.

‘In these times, there were about sixty brewers in the town; and each kept one or two men, who were boarded in the house. They were a set of stout jovial fellows, always ready for a row. Their most esteemed accomplishment, however, was their skill in brewing ale, which was greatly relished by all classes, and was sold at a very fair price; a measure, which contained nearly a quart, was retailed out of the house at a halfpenny, and before tea became fashionable, was in high favour with the wives. Such was its efficacy, that a few applications to the pundie was apt to infringe the rules of decorum. In the house, this beverage cost a penny the bottle, and a more potent infusion was sold at twopence. To these halcyon days, when a company could enjoy themselves a whole evening at a penny a head, the octogenarian may look back with unavailing regret. Who that has visited the “Turk’s Head” of an evening, and tasted Luckie Kettles’s extra, and her salt herring and oat-cakes, can ever forget the happiness and the devotion of the company in applying themselves to the business of the evening? Everybody in Perth, whether soldier or civilian, knew Lucky Kettles; and her praises were sung, and her cheer extolled, by all who had ever the felicity of her acquaintance.

‘If it be true that an article becomes good and cheap in proportion to the demand, there must have been a great deal of spirits consumed. Highland whisky sold at a shilling the Scotch pint [two English quarts], and received especial patronage as a morning-dram. This was a very general indulgence. The Indian was a moderate man who wished his throat were a mile long, that he might taste the rum all the way. Many of our worthies would have had no objection though the morning had lasted until night, if they could have drunk whisky all the time. An old flesher, who was rather remarkable for his attachment to an early stimulant, always observed as he drained the glass : “I have taken it off, as it is my morning.” He was often known to drink eight or ten before breakfast. The morning was necessary to restore their nerves. A walk was taken, perhaps the length of the Inch Head or Queen Mary’s Well, in order to qualify their morning, when probably an additional dose would be taken to overcome the fatigue of their walk. Even many of the gudewives kept a private bottle; and as it was esteemed a specific for almost all the ills of life, it is little wonder if they occasionally exceeded in their potations.

‘About the year 1765, tea began to be introduced; and if it has promoted the change which has since taken place in the character, habits, and social comforts of the people, we may hail it as one of the greatest blessings which commerce ever bestowed upon mankind. At first it was taken only by stealth. The tea-equipage was placed in the press, and the gudewife, as she took the forbidden cup, stood with the door in her hand, to be ready to shut it on the approach of any one. It was long before the tea-table assumed its present attractive elegance. The first tea-dishes that appeared were an extremely coarse cream-coloured ware. Indian china was excessively dear—the price of half-a-dozen cups and saucers being from twenty to thirty shillings; the price of a tea-pot was half a guinea. About 1774, Staffordshire ware appeared ; and the vast improvement which skill and enterprise introduced into this manufacture, soon expelled the Indian china from the market.

'The writer recollects some amusing specimens of early tea-drinking. An Ochil laird, who was in the habit of attending Perth market with butter and cheese, breakfasted one morning in his father's house. This laird was quite a specimen of a class which has since become extinct, or greatly modified, and therefore merits a description. His figure was tall and gaunt ; his long gray hair flowed over his shoulders, and his rough beard had been trimmed with a pair of shears ; his dress was a suit of hadden-gray, spun and dyed in the family ; the shoes, of strong neat-leather, were fastened with large brass buckles ; the coat and waistcoat, made in the fashion already described, exposed his long bare neck ; with the shirt made of coarse tweeling, fastened with a button. John having been desired to help himself, commenced by cutting a lump of butter, which he proceeded to spread on a slice of bread with his thumb, first taking the precaution to lubricate it well with spittle, to prevent the butter adhering to it ; he then began to sup the tea with a spoon in the manner of soup. A wag of a chapman, who happened to be present, said : "Hoot man, John, that's no the way to drink tea : take the saucer to your head, and drink it as ye see me do." John being thus corrected, conceived that the fashion was to drink the beverage after the manner of ale ; and, accordingly, taking up the cup, drank their healths round ; and an interchange of compliments was continued till they rose from the table. This worthy held a property in the Ochils that would now yield an income of L.1000 a year ; and yet he came to Perth mounted on a Galloway, with a straw saddle, and a pair of branks and hair-tether for a bridle, and thus brought his butter and cheese to market. Having got breakfast, he generously invited those of the family who were of age, and the chapman, to drink his stable-fee. Five individuals, accordingly, accompanied him, and John treated them to a bottle of ale, which cost him a penny ; and this was all the recompense the public-house received for stabbing his horse !'.

THE GENTRY.

Referring to the style of living among the gentry in the earlier half of the eighteenth century, an interesting paper appeared in the Edinburgh Magazine for 1817. It was the composition of a deceased gentlewoman of Renfrewshire, whom the editor described as distinguished both for goodness of heart and solidity of judgment. It proceeds as follows :—

' The year 1727 is as far back as I can remember : at that time there was little bread in Scotland, manufactories brought to no perfection either in linen or woollen ; every woman made her web, and bleached it herself ; it never rose higher than 2s. a yard, and with this cloth was every one clothed. The young men, who were at this time growing more nice, got theirs from Holland for shirts ; but the old ones were satisfied with necks and sleeves of the fine, which were put on loose above the country cloth. I remember in 1730 or '31 of a ball, where it was agreed that the company should be dressed in nothing but home manufactures. My sisters were as well dressed as any, and their gowns were stript linen, at 2s. 6d. a yard ; their heads and ruffles were of Paisley muslins, at 4s. 6d., with 4d. edging from Hamilton—all of them the finest that could be got. A few years after this, weavers were brought from Holland, and manufactories for linen established in the west. The dress of the ladies was more expensive than at present, though not so often renewed. At the time I remember, hoops were wore constantly four yards and a half round, which required much silk to cover them ; and gold and silver were much used for trimmings—never less than three rows round the petticoat. Their heads were all dressed with lace from Flanders ; no blonds nor coarse edging used : the price of these were high, but two suit would serve for life. They were not renewed but at marriage or some great event: who could not afford them, wore fringes of thread. Their tables were as full as at present, though the meat was ill cooked, and as badly served up. They ate out of pewter, often not clean, but were nicer in table-linen than now, which was renewed every day in gentlemen's families, and always napkins. The servants ate ill, having a set form by the week, of three days broth and salt meat, and three days meagre, with plenty of oat-bread and small-beer. Their wages were small till the vails were abolished: the men from L.3 to L.9 in the year, the women from L.1, 10s. to L.2. At those times I mention, few of the women-servants would either sew or iron linen, which was all smoothed in the mangle, except the ladies' head-dresses, which were done by their own maids. They in general employed as many servants as they do at present in the country, not in towns, where one man-servant was thought sufficient for most families, or two at most, unless they kept a carriage, which was a thing very uncommon in those days, and only used by the nobles of great fortune. Their manners were peculiar to themselves: as some part of the old feudal system still remained, every-master was revered by his family, honoured by his tenants, and awful to his domestics; his hours of eating, sleeping, and amusement, were carefully attended to by all his family, and by all his guests. Even his hours of devotion were marked, that nothing might interrupt him: he kept his own seat by the fire, or at table, with his hat on his head, and often had particular dishes served up for himself, that no one else shared of. Their children approached them with awe, and never spoke with any degree of freedom before them. The consequence of this was, that, except at meals, they were never together, though the reverence they had for their parents taught them obedience, modesty, temperance. No one helped themselves at table, nor was it the fashion to eat up what was put on their plate; so that the mistress of the family might give you a full meal or not as she pleased, from whence came in the fashion of pressing to eat, so far as to be disagreeable.

‘Before the Union, and for many years after it, money was very scarce in Scotland. A country without trade, or culture, or money to carry on either, must improve by slow degrees. A great part of the rents of estates were paid in kind ; this allowed gentlemen to live comfortably at home, though they could not elsewhere. As few people could afford to go to town in the winter, their acquaintance was much confined. The children of this small society were under a necessity of being companions to each other ; this produced many strong friendships, and strong attachments, and frequently very improper marriages. By their society being confined, their affections were less diffused, and centered all in their own family circle. There was no enlargement of mind here : their manners were the same, and their sentiments the same. They were indulgent to the faults of each other, but most severe on those they were not accustomed to ; so that censure and detraction seemed to be the vices of the age.

‘From this education proceeded pride of understanding, bigotry in religion, and want of refinement in every useful art.

‘While the parents were both alive, the mother could give little attention to her girls—domestic affairs, and amusing her husband, was the business of a good wife. Those who could afford governesses for their children, had them ; but all they could learn from them was to read English, and do plain work : the chief thing required was to hear them repeat psalms and long catechisms, in which they were employed an hour or more every day, and almost the whole day on Sunday. If there were no governess to perform this, it was done by the chaplain, of which there was one in every family. No attention was given to what we call accomplishments : reading or writing well, or even spelling, was never thought of ; music, drawing, or French, was seldom taught the girls. They were allowed to run about, and amuse themselves in the way they chose, even to womanhood, at which time they were generally sent to Edinburgh for a winter or two, to learn to dress themselves, to dance, and to see a little of the world—which world was only to be seen at church, at marriages, burials, and baptisms. When in the country, their only employment was working in coloured-work, beds, tapestry, and other pieces of furniture, imitations of fruits and flowers, with very little taste. If they read any, it was either books of devotion or long romances, and sometimes both.

‘From the accounts given by old people who lived in this time, we have reason to believe there was as little care taken of the young men’s education as that of women, excepting those who were intended for learned professions, who got a regular education at schools and colleges ; but the generality of country gentlemen, and even noblemen, were contented with the instruction given by the chaplain to their sons.

‘That the manners of the times I write of may be shewn in a fuller light, I shall give Mr Barclay’s relation of the most memorable things that passed in his father’s house, from the beginning of the century to the year 14, in which his father died. “My brother,” says he, “was married in the year 4, at the age of twenty-one ; few men were unmarried after this time of life. I myself was married by my friends at eighteen, which was thought a proper age. Sir James Stuart’s marriage with President Dalrymple’s second daughter brought together a number of people related to both families. At the signing of the eldest Miss Dalrymple’s contract the year before, there was an entire hogshead of wine drank that night, and the number of people at Sir James Stuart’s was little less. The marriage was in the president’s house, with as many of the relations as it would hold. The bride’s favours were all sewed on her gown, from top to bottom, and round the neck and sleeves. The moment the ceremony was performed, the whole company ran to her, and pulled off the favours ; in an instant she was stripped of them all. The next ceremony was the garter, which the bridegroom's man attempted to pull from her leg ; but she dropped it on the floor : it was a white and silver ribbon, which was cut in small morsels to every one in company. The bride's mother then came in with a basket of favours belonging to the bridegroom ; those and the bride's were the same with the bearings of their families : hers pink and white, his blue and gold colour."

'The company dined and supped together, and had a ball in the evening ; the same next day at Sir James Stuart's. On Sunday, there went from the president's house to church three-and-twenty couples, all in high dress : Mr Barclay, then a boy, led the youngest Miss Dalrymple, who was the last of them. They filled the galleries of the church from the king's seat to the wing-loft. The feasting continued till they had gone through all the friends of the family, with a ball every night.

'As the baptisms formed another public occasion, he goes on to describe it thus :

"On the fourth week after the lady's delivery, she was set on her bed on a low footstool, the bed covered with some neat piece of sewed-work or white satin, with three pillows at her back covered with the same ; she in full dress, with a lappet head-dress and a fan in her hand. Having informed her acquaintance what day she is to see company, they all come and pay their respects to her, standing or walking a little through the room, for there are no chairs ; they drink a glass of wine and eat a piece of cake, and then give place to others. Towards the end of the week, all the friends were asked to what was called the Cummerfalls : this was a supper, where every gentleman brought a pint of wine, to be drunk by him and his wife. The supper was—a ham at the head, and a pyramid of fowls at the bottom, hens and ducks below, and partridges at top ; there was an eating-posset in the middle of the table, with dried fruits and sweet-meats at the sides. When they had finished their supper, the meat was removed, and in an instant every one flew to the sweetmeats, to pocket them, on which a scramble ensued, chairs overturned, and everything on the table, wrestling and pulling at one another with the utmost noise and violence. When all was quiet, they went to the stoups (for there were no bottles for wine), of which the women had a good share ; for though it was a disgrace to be seen drunk, yet it was none to be a little intoxicated in good company. A few days after this, the same company were asked to the christening, which was always in the church, all in high dress—a number of them young ladies, who were called Maiden Cummers : one of them presented the child to the father. After the ceremony, they dined and supped together, and the night often concluded by a ball."

‘The burials are the only solemnities now to be taken notice of. They were generally always on foot, and the magistrates and town-council were always invited to that of every person of any consideration. “Fifteen hundred burial-letters were wrote,” says Mr Barclay, “at my father’s death ; the General Assembly was sitting at the time, and all the clergy were asked ; and so great was the crowd, that the magistrates were at the grave in the Greyfriars’ Churchyard before the corpse was taken out of the house in the foot of the Advocates’ Close. A few years before this, it had ceased to be the fashion for ladies to walk behind the corpse, in full dress, with coloured clothes ; but formerly the chesting was at the same time, and all the female relations asked, which made part of the procession.”

‘At this time, acts of devotion employed much of the time. The same gentleman gives the following account of a Sunday fast in his father’s house :—Prayers by the chaplain at nine o’clock—all went regularly to church at ten, the women in high dress ; he himself was employed to give the collection for the family, which consisted of a crown—half after twelve, they came home—at one, had prayers again by the chaplain, after which they had a bit of cold meat or eggs, and returned to church at two. At four, every one retired to their private devotions, except the children and servants, who were convened by the chaplain, and examined : this continued till five, when supper was served up, or rather dinner: a few male friends generally partook of this meal, and sat till eight; after which psalm-singing, reading, and prayers, were performed by the old gentleman himself, and then they all retired.

‘Whether the genius of a people forms their religious sentiments, or if religion forms, in some measure, the manners of a people, I shall leave the wise to decide. I shall only observe, that while that reverence remained in the minds of men for masters, fathers, and heads of clans, it was then that the dread of Deity was most powerful. This will appear from the superstitious writings of the times. The fear of hell, and deceitful power of the devil, were at the bottom of all their religious sentiments. The established belief in witchcraft, for which many suffered, prevailed much at this time; ghosts, too, and apparitions of various kinds, were believed to prevail; few old houses were without a ghost-chamber, that few had courage to sleep in; omens and dreams were much regarded, even by people of the best education. These were the manners of the last century [the seventeenth], and remained in part for many years in this.

‘In well-regulated families, there was then a degree of attention paid the old, yea, even servility, that this age knows nothing of, and whoever was wanting in it, was unfit for company. Nobody in those times thought of pleasing themselves: the established rule was to please your company; endeavour to make them think well of themselves, and they will think well of you for doing so. Society was not yet so much enlarged as to weaken the affections of near relations. This may easily be ascertained by every one now alive that is past fifty: not only brothers and sisters, but brothers and sisters-in-law, mothers-in-law, and even more distant connections, would leave their own families for ten or twelve days, and attend with the utmost care a friend in a fever or dangerous disorder: these were the nurse-keepers for the first thirty years of this century, who by every method endeavoured to lessen their distress, nor left them night or day till they were recovered or buried.

'The intercourse between relations and friends was kept up in another way—which was by small presents, mostly consisting of meat and drink; anything rare or good of its kind was in part sent to a friend; whatever rank in life they were in, these presents were received with thanks, and returned in kind, on proper occasions: neither were strangers nor people of high rank sought after in their entertainments; it was their relations, the friends they loved, that shared their delicacies.

'It was about this time [namely, in the early youth of the writer], that tea-tables were established. It was the fashion for the men to meet regularly in the change-house, as it was then called, for their different clubs, where they spent the evening in conversation, without much expense: a shilling-reckoning was very high; and for people of the first fashion, it was more general from fourpence to eightpence, paying besides for their tobacco and pipes, which were much in use in some of these clubs. They played at backgammon or catch-honours for a penny the game. All business was transacted in the forenoon, and in the change-houses; the lawyers were there consulted, and the bill paid by the employer. The wine was sherry in mutchkin-stoups; every new one was chalked on the head of the stoup: it was incredible the quantity that was drunk on these occasions. Everybody dined at home in private, unless called to some of the entertainments mentioned above; but the tea-table very soon introduced supping in private houses, where young people found themselves happy with one another. They were loath to part, so that supping came to be the universal fashion in Edinburgh; and lest the families they visited might be unprepared, they sent in the morning to know if they were to drink tea at home, as they wished to wait on them. Amongst friends, this was always considered as a supper, and any of their male acquaintances asked that they could command, to make up the party. The acquaintances made up at public places did not visit in this way : they hired a chair for the afternoon, and run through a number of houses, as is the fashion still. These manners continued till 1760, when more of the English fashions took place ; one of which was to dine at three, and what company you had should be at dinner. These dinners lasted long. The women sat for half an hour after them, and retired to tea ; but gentlemen took their bottle, and generally sat till eight. The women are all the evening by themselves, which puts a stop to that intercourse so necessary for the improvement of both sexes.'

FARMERS AND PEASANTRY.

Till the immediately past age, the rural population of Scotland appear to have lived in by no means an Arcadian condition. From the conversation of grandams, and the traces of the old manners which may still be perceived in sequestered parts of the country, we can readily, even at this day, appreciate the hardships and discomforts which the whole body of the peasantry endured in former times. They were unquestionably very great, and such as could only have been supported under the combined influence of ignorance and a submissive and self-denying disposition. At the conclusion of a popular history of Scotland, written by Mr John Struthers of Glasgow, and published by Messrs Blackie and Son of that city, there is an account of the domestic system of the inferior kind of farmers in the western counties, about the middle of the eighteenth century—which, though presenting a picture of startling sordidness, does not, we are persuaded, greatly exaggerate the real features of what it professes to describe. ‘ Over the country in general, that venerable personage, Use-and-Wont, with his faithful attendants, Sloth, and Famine, and Nastiness, still held an almost unbroken dominion. To those who are not old enough to remember having seen the last remains of it in operation, no description can give anything like an adequate idea of the wretched economy that was at this period prevalent. Except the kail-yard, and the barn-yard, of which it most commonly made a part, there were no enclosures, and these were generally very imperfect ones. Many farms were still held in run-rig, and the corn was no sooner off the fields, than all the cattle of a neighbourhood, being driven to the door, and left to wander where they would, herded together through the day, and if any one had a rig or two of stubble not fully picked, as they graphically termed it, a herd of a hundred or a hundred and fifty of his own and his neighbours' cattle did it most effectually in a couple of hours.' The farmhouses were generally thatched hovels of at most two apartments—a but and a ben; while in every proper convenience there was a lamentable deficiency. Often rain dropped through the roof; and the apartments being perpetually filled with smoke, every rafter was feathered with soot. In such a state of things, it may easily be conceived that dairy operations, performed within the sphere of the only sitting and eating apartment, were on a rude and unsatisfactory scale. 'But if the dairy was mismanaged on the part of the women, the husbandry was perhaps still more so on the part of the men. The plough made use of was the old Scottish, drawn by four horses; itself, from the clumsiness of its make, a sufficient draught for two of them, though it had never entered the earth. The horses were for the most part in no great heart; they were also accoutred in a very uncouth manner.' The operations with this clumsy ploughing-machine were of a very rude and insufficient kind; and so late was every crop for want of proper management, that harvest was retarded; sometimes, indeed, reaping was not over when the winter snows began to cover the ground.

Of substantial clothing among the farm population, there was often superabundance; but much of it consisted of coarse woollen materials, generally home-spun. Linen sheets were unknown; the bedding was altogether of twilled blankets, changed at distant intervals; and the beds were usually ticks stuffed with chaff. Instead of hats, the farmers wore woollen bonnets, and for the sake of warmth, these were kept on the head even at the fireside. The women were usually dressed in plaiden or drugget, in the plainest possible style. It was not customary for the females to wear shoes and stockings, except at church, or on holiday occasions.

Such being the condition of the farmer's family, what must have been the misery of the labourer, or cottager as he was then called, with his sixpence a day when he was employed, and his employment often but partial? The truth is, though he was honoured with another designation, he was in reality neither less nor more than a pauper, who was indulged on the farm where his cottage was situated, partly from habit or custom, and partly on account of real or supposed utility. He had a house, such as it was, for very little money, and this always paid by personal services on the farm. Milk and whey he received gratis at all times when his superiors had any to themselves; only in return, his wife and his children, if come the length, and not otherwise employed, were ready to lend a hand at the weeding and the pulling of the flax, and perhaps a day or two in the meadow at hay-making; but with all this, it was impossible that sixpence a day, though it had been certain every day in the year, which it was not, could procure a sufficiency of the coarsest food and clothing for a large family. It was the policy, however, of the cottager and his wife to be at all times upon the best terms with the gudeman and the gudewife, as the farmer and his wife in these days were always denominated; and it would have been highly discreditable, especially for the gudewife, to have been reported as close-handed. When a grist came from the mill, it was thought no more than duty to send out of it a meal to the cotter and his family. When the sheep were shorn, it was also customary to give the cotter's wife as much of the wool as might be a pair of stockings, and weft for a bit of drugget for a short-gown, a petticoat, or an apron; for which, after being spun, the gudewife was often kind enough to allow her to warp it on the end.

her own web, and by this and such - like means the poor family came to be clothed often at very little expenc. It very seldom happened, indeed, that anything very particular came in the way of the farmer—such as a drowned stirk, or a sheep which had died of braxy—but what the cotter had some small share of it, less or more ; so that his family fared better, or at least more like his betters, than at first sight one would suppose.'

The progress of a change for the better was manifested towards the year 1780. The country may be said to have awakened from a slumber. Agricultural improvements began to be talked of ; and a new spirit was infused into the rural population by the Highland Society—an institution which has had an immense influence on the affairs of Scotland. Yet, it is proper to note that improvements were greatly promoted through the agency of manufacturing industry. Perhaps the most wonderful thing of all, was the sudden rise of Glasgow, by means of the cotton manufacture. Shortly after the invention of spinning-machinery by Sir Richard Arkwright, ' mills for spinning cotton were erected—chiefly by companies of Glasgow or Paisley merchants—at Lanark ; at Catrine, in Ayrshire ; at Balindalloch and Doune, in Stirlingshire ; at Rothsay, in the Island of Bute ; at Blantyre, at Busby, at Pollockshaws, at the Bridge of Weir, at Johnstone, and at Linwood, &c. ; all upon such an extensive scale as to be like the setting down of a city at each of these places. From this period, the progress and the improvement of the country has been such, as there is no parallel to be found to it in history. Spinning, weaving, tambouring, sewing, bleaching, dyeing, and printing, besides giving an impetus to so many arts necessarily connected with them, were each in themselves most lucrative and extensive sources of employment. Villages rose up as if by magic ; the humble farm-steading—whose height would scarcely for a moment have retarded the progress of an English hunter, but whose lengthened and verdant roof, while it shewed every inequality of the ground over which it was extended, had sheltered for centuries many a generation of successive inmates, rational and irrational, began everywhere to disappear, its place being supplied by the handsome modern mansion, with all its offices arranged for convenience and comfort. Hedging, ditching, planting, and improving, called forth energies of which no one knew he was in possession, till in the person of his neighbour, he beheld them in full operation. The beautiful hedgerows, the thriving clumps, and the convenient enclosures of one proprietor, excited the taste and awakened the emulation of another, till hands could with difficulty be found to execute, or a sufficiency of materials to complete, the improvements that were in progress; while each, astonished at the beauty and fertility that so suddenly began to glow around him, was anxious to engage in new and still more extensive experiments.

'These rapid improvements necessarily produced a remarkable change in the habits of the people, and in all their modes of operation. Negligence and sloth gave place to patient industry and careful economy. The cumbrous and inefficient implements of husbandry, so long handed down from one generation to another, without any attempts either at alteration or improvement, now fell into disuse, and practices, evidently the offspring of indolence, were laid aside. With ploughs of a lighter make, and a more happy construction, one man and two horses performed the work that formerly required two men and four horses.' In draining, manuring, ploughing, and general husbandry, all is on a new and enlarged scale; and everything may be said to have added materially to the farmer's general returns.

Taking all circumstances into account, the condition of landed gentry and their tenant-farmers has prodigiously improved in Scotland within the last sixty years. The country, in fact, is not like the same thing—splendid mansions; finely laid out lawns; substantial stone and slated farmhouses; first-rate agriculture; the best breeds of cattle and sheep; climate improved by draining and planting; good roads and means of intercourse established.

by railways and steam-vessels ; a desire for education, and a vast improvement in temperance and other habits ; and into all, an impartial and firm administration of the law, through the agency of intelligent magistrates (sheriffs-substitute), planted in every county. In short, matters are immensely changed for the better in all rural districts.

In only one thing has improvement not kept pace with the general advance. The labouring population and farm-servants, though better off in many respects, do not manifest that measure of advancement which is enjoyed by the classes above them. The Scottish peasant, indeed, is no longer a serf; his clothing is comfortable, and he eats something better than 'saltless pottage;' but, how true ! man requires more than mere animal enjoyments. His better faculties and feelings need to be stimulated ; and this, we regret to say, has been in a large degree neglected in the general scramble of national advancement.

INTERESTING SURGICAL CASE.

SURGEONS, in the course of their practice, are occasionally called upon to extract articles of a very extraordinary nature from the human body. Needles and pins, for instance, are sometimes inadvertently swallowed, and go into the stomach, from which they perhaps work their way to the surface of the body, and are extracted by surgical aid. Sharp or pointed pieces of bone which have been swallowed in eating, are known to have been obtruded through the body in the same manner. Nature, it is well known, is most energetic in its struggles to expel foreign substances from the body ; and if it fail in this its first object, it generally adopts the next best course—endeavours to seclude the substance, by surrounding it with a sack ; thus, if possible, keeping it from doing harm to the system. Every effort, however, which nature makes, is frequently baffled, and art has to be employed to relieve the sufferer.

One of the most remarkable instances of the extraction of a foreign substance from the body, which ever came within our knowledge, was published in the Lancet (Dec. 2, 1837.) It is the narration of a case in which a steel table-fork was extracted from the back of a common seaman; and being written by the gentleman who operated—Dr David Burnes, of 4 Vernon Place, Bloomsbury Square, London—is worthy of all credence. We take the liberty of laying it before our readers:—

‘ Robert Syme, aged twenty-three, was entered on the sick-list of His Majesty’s ship Belvidera, about the middle of June 1831, complaining of pain at the inferior angle of the right scapula, close to the base of which was a small phlegmon, as I then considered it, in the early stage of suppuration. On the 19th of June, I opened “the boil,” and ordered poultices to be applied, thinking it would heal kindly in a few days. On the 23d, however, on probing the wound, I felt what I first thought was the edge of the scapula; but, on more minute examination, something black and shining was seen in the wound. On the 24th, it being evident that there was some foreign body in the wound, the opening was enlarged directly upwards, and a piece of steel, about the thickness of a common ramrod, presented itself, but resisted strongly any efforts to extract it. Being unwilling to put him to further pain, while there was a chance of its coming away by poulticing, and pulling it with the forceps daily, this gentler course was agreed on in preference to making a further enlargement of the wound. Being questioned as to the nature of the piece of steel, he expressed himself as much astonished as we were at its presence, and said he should not have known it had we not told him, and had he not felt pain from our pulling it with the forceps. He had never been in action, having been only two years in the king’s service, nor did he recollect having received any wound by which anything of the kind could have been introduced. About two inches below the opening made on the 19th, we observed a small white speck, or mark, rather resembling the mark left many years after vaccination than a cicatrice of a wound. This was the only vestige of anything like a wound that we could detect in his back.

'July 2. The poulticing has been continued, and there is now a free discharge from the wound; the steel has been pulled daily by the forceps, and admits now of further motion, especially laterally, but is yet forcibly retained at its upper part. Its direction is nearly parallel with the base of the scapula, close to which it lies, and in its course upwards it seems to incline deep into the substance of the muscles. About an inch of it can be seen when the integuments are retracted. He is averse to further measures; has no pain except from the use of the forceps. Continue the poultices.

'16. Though the poulticing has been continued, and the steel pulled daily, there is no material alteration since last report, further than that the steel may be moved more freely in every direction, except when pulled directly downwards, when it seems to be retained as forcibly as at first. The probe can be introduced into the wound, upwards and inwards, nearly four inches, and can with some difficulty be made to move round the steel; but no information as to its size or shape can be gained from this mode of examination. It occurred to me, at this time, that it was a hook, and that it might be retained by catching on one of the ribs. Having no pain except from the pulling, and being still averse to the use of the knife, the same treatment was pursued.

'August 5. The foreign body having become very little loosened, and now causing more pain on its being moved, I made a deep incision of about three inches in length over its course upwards, using it as a director, when it was easily extracted, and found to be a common kitchen fork, broken off close to its handle, and with one of its two prongs wanting about an inch from its point: it was blackened, and in some degree rusted. It seemed to have been retained by a bridle of muscular fibres embracing its shoulders, for it was immediately liberated when the part was divided by the knife. The wound was dressed simply, and healed so soon that in ten days the man was doing duty in the boats and aloft.'

[Here is a drawing of the fork, which is exactly the size of forks in daily use, but with the appearance of corrosion, and broken off from the handle. About an inch of the pointed end of one of the prongs is also broken off, and is laid close to the part to which it had belonged. The manner in which this broken-off portion was afterwards got, is subsequently narrated.]

'Strange as it may seem, even after its extraction, the man persisted in adhering to his original statement of his being ignorant how and when it had been introduced; and during the two months I remained in the ship, I was not able to gain further information on the matter. He seemed to have no defect of memory in any way, for he, without hesitation, gave me every information. I asked as to his former life and habits. He is a native of Topsham, Devonshire, has been at sea since he was twelve years of age, and in the merchant service till two years ago, when he joined His Majesty's ship Tweed, at the Isle of France, and from which ship he was paid off immediately before joining the Belvidera in February last.

'Setting aside his own statement altogether, my own opinion is, that it must have been in his back for many months, if not for years, judging from the indistinct and ill-defined mark left, taking it for granted that this was the wound by which it had been introduced, but which is yet problematical, from the little pain he experienced from its presence; and more especially from the knowledge that, during the previous months while he belonged to the Belvidera, he was never one day off his duty or on the sick-list. Your readers are, however, as well able as myself now to form conjectures on the subject.

'Having already experienced a difficulty in convincing some sceptical individuals of the facts above related, I may in justice to your readers and myself, state, that as the case excited great interest, while under treatment, the patient was seen by the Honourable Captain Dundas, Dr Tweeddale, and most of the officers and crew of the ship; and also by Mr Geddes, Mr Chartres, and Dr Jones, surgeons, Royal Navy; and the fork was extracted in the presence of Dr Tweeddale—who assisted me—Mr Yates, and others.

' The patient continued to serve in the Belvidera till December 1833, when he joined His Majesty's ship Blonde, going to South America. Being anxious to trace his future history, in the hope of obtaining some clue as to the introduction of the fork, I was enabled, through the kindness of Sir William Burnett, the physician-general of the navy, on the arrival of the Blonde at Portsmouth about a month ago, to communicate with him by letter. The result was, that he came up to London, and on the 18th of November, called upon me to shew himself. He then stated, that about eighteen months ago, while washing himself, he felt a small hard body on the left side of the neck, which he was inclined to believe was part of the fork. On examining the part, I had no doubt myself of its being the portion of the broken prong, and which I asked permission to extract. He readily assented; but before the operation, I submitted him to the inspection of Sir William Burnett, Sir Astley Cooper, Sir Stephen Hammick, Mr Liston, and other gentlemen, who corroborated my opinion as to its being a portion of the fork, and recommended its extraction. On the 20th, in the presence of Mr C. Smith, surgeon, I made an incision over it (its position being just behind the middle part of the posterior edge of the sternocleido mastoideus muscle, where it is crossed by the external jugular vein), when it was easily removed, and proved to be the prong, which had the same bronzed appearance as the fork itself, and was coated with rust at its fractured end. It does not exactly join with the fork, and I am inclined to think some very minute splinters may have been broken from it when fractured, or some chemical action while in the body may have corroded it.

'It is singular that he had never suffered pain from it, although it had crossed from the right side of the back to the left side of the neck. I was only induced to extract it from its superficial position, and the singularity of the history, yet it is possible it might, in time, have advanced still farther, and have injured the carotid artery, or trachea.'

'Although cross-questioned by all who saw him, he still repeats his former story of being innocent as to the introduction of the fork. As he felt little inconvenience from my incision, he has left town with the intention of joining His Majesty's ship President, for another three years' cruise, and, from what I know of him, I am convinced my steel-backed friend will do credit to the wooden walls of Old England.'

'No rational person,' adds the editor of the Lancet, 'can for a moment suppose that the ignorance of the man was real. The wound caused by such an instrument must have been in the highest degree severe, and an effort to withdraw it appears to have been the cause of the forcible fracture near the handle. The persevering manner in which Dr Burnes has followed up this interesting case is praiseworthy, and does credit to his professional industry.'

THE ASS AND THE TREASURE:

AN ARABIAN TALE.

[The ass, in Europe, is a byword for all that is dull, obstinate, and stupid. Very different is the case in the East; and not unnaturally so, seeing that the animal, under the more genial skies of Oriental latitudes, is as remarkable for docility, activity, and swiftness, as well as for elegance of form, as its European congener is for tardiness of step and meanness of aspect. The Egyptian Arabs give the ass the precedence over all other four-footed creatures for intelligence and sagacity, and their story-tellers bring forward as many stories in support of this opinion as would have kept Scheherezade from the block or the bowstring for another month or two. Our young readers may be pleased with a sample of these tales, and we select for their amusement one which we find contributed to a recent French periodical by M. P. Granal, a writer who has personally visited the East, and who, by other compositions, has proved himself to be thoroughly conversant with its fictions and customs. He describes himself as having heard the story from the lips of his temporary attendant in Egypt, a professed narrator of such matters.]

RAJEB was a young man of Cairo, who had been left by his father with a fortune of about 2000 piastres. Had he embarked this little fortune in trade, and been industrious, he might have lived very comfortably; but he fell in love soon after his father died, and could think of nothing but the fair object of his passion. She was a young girl, whose countenance he had first seen for a moment, when by chance she put aside her veil to drink at the fountain of a mosque. She was very plainly dressed, and appeared to belong to some humble but decent family. But she was rich in beauty, at least, and in modesty, for she hastily replaced her veil on seeing a young man looking at her, and walked away without turning to the right or the left, or looking back as coquettes do. Rajeb followed her, and saw her enter a plain house, of the kind inhabited by the middle orders. From this time forward, Rajeb was consumed by the passion which had sprung up in his breast. Of the object of it he could learn no more, than that she was as virtuous and well-behaved as she was beautiful. At length he went to the parents of his mistress, and asked her hand in marriage. They received him very kindly; but when he came to speak of the dowry which they expected to be given by their daughter's husband, they demanded the sum of 5000 piastres. This was above the lover's means, and he exclaimed loudly against the enormity of the sum; but they were obstinate, and Rajeb could only prevail on them to give him a few days to reflect, and to look about him for means. If he did not appear at the end of the stated time, they would hold themselves at liberty, they told him, to accept of other offers.

Rajeb returned home, lamenting and reproaching himself with having idled away his past time. ‘Ah! if I had worked hard,’ said he, ‘I might have increased my fortune, and might now have been happy!’ He took out his money, and counted it several times, but he could not thus make it more than it was—2000 piastres. He lay down on his bed, and tried to sleep, but his mind was too much occupied with projects for procuring the required dowry to permit him to rest. At last, he bethought him of a maternal uncle at Tantah, whom he had not seen for eighteen years, and who was said to be rich. Rajeb had no sooner thought of this person than he resolved to visit him. He would borrow the 3000 piastres: a rich relation could not refuse such a sum. The young man longed for the coming of day to set out on this hopeful errand.

Morning at length dawned, and Rajeb started on his journey. In order to save money, he went on foot, hoping also to interest his uncle the more by this economy. When he reached the first houses of Tantah, he inquired for his uncle Jousoff, ‘the rich Jousoff,’ of several boys whom he met.

‘The rich Jousoff!’ cried they; ‘say rather the old beggarly miser Jousoff, who regrets to throw away a bone when he has picked it white! ’

One of the boys, however, conducted Rajeb to his uncle’s house. The young man entered it trembling, for the description which he had heard was by no means encouraging. When his uncle came to him, Rajeb saw an old, withered, ragged, dirty being, who cried: ‘What do you want?’ in a rough voice.

‘Ah, my dear uncle!’ cried Rajeb, throwing his arms about the old man, ‘do you not remember me? I am Rajeb, the son of your sister—little Rajeb, whom you loved when a boy. I am come, dear uncle, to see if you are well.’

‘Very well,’ said Jousoff; ‘I am very well, but very poor. I shall not be able to shew you very splendid hospitality.’

‘What then?’ said Rajeb cheerfully: ‘riches and poverty come from God.’

At these words, they entered the old man's apartment, dark and dingy, without any other furniture than an old mat and a jar of water; neither pipes nor coffee was to be seen. Rajeb, however, was patient, and shewed no ill-humour. That evening they feasted upon a crust of wretched cheese, and some crumbs of black, detestable bread. The cheese, such as it was, was a novelty in that place, and the neighbours, who saw the old man buy it, could scarcely believe their eyes.

Rajeb was not accustomed to rich fare; but after his journey, he stood really in need of soup and roast, or something else that was good. But he ate the bread and cheese, and said nothing. When they had done, he tried to lead the conversation by degrees to the object of his journey. The old man, however, anticipated his purpose, and cried: 'I am poor, a beggar: no dervish is poorer than I am: I am ruined: all the world robs me. I have spent my last para upon a dinner for you.'

Rajeb perceived that he had to deal with a heart of marble; so, after trying in vain to soften the old man by descriptions of his mistress's beauty and his own passion, the youth rose, and, under pretence of taking the air, went out to conceal his bitter disappointment and vexation.

Troubled as he was with his own matters, Rajeb could not look without pity on a poor ass which he saw on going out of doors, and which was lying in a little shed, munching some morsels of straw that lay within its reach. Rajeb, who loved animals, approached to caress the poor, lean, starved creature, which was all hide-sore; and the ass seemed sensible of the affection shewn to it. Prompted by his natural benevolence, Rajeb then went away, and bought a measure of barley, and almost forgot his own griefs in the pleasure of seeing the ass fall to its food with the liveliest marks of joy. After bringing it water to complete its meal, the youth went back to his uncle. It is needless to say that Rajeb passed an unhappy night: he lay on the floor, and the vermin infesting the place were sufficient of themselves to banish sleep. In the morning, the two relations breakfasted on the relics of yesterday's meal, and then the nephew was about to take his leave. But his uncle stopped him, and said: 'I have an ass which is of no use to me. It is all that remains to me of my substance, and if you wish'—Rajeb thought his uncle was about to make him a present of the ass, but he was in error, for the old man proceeded—"if you wish, you may go with me to the market, and see me sell him."

Rajeb consented, and when they went to the stall of the ass, the young man again caressed the poor animal. In return, it looked at him with eyes full of intelligence, and struck the ground several times with its foot. Rajeb even thought he heard it say: 'Buy me.' Its looks at least, he thought, said so.

On the way to the market, Rajeb reflected on the subject, and felt himself impelled to purchase the ass by some involuntary feeling, which most people would have been disposed merely to call good-nature or pity. As the ass was young, and had no faults but those arising from starvation, several purchasers came forward. One offered 200 piastres, another 300, and at last the price mounted to 500. When Rajeb saw that his uncle was willing to take this, he offered a few piastres more, assured that he would get the ass. 'What do you want with the ass?' said the old man.

'I am resolved upon having it,' was all that the nephew answered.

'Ah, well,' said Jousoff, with a smile of greedy pleasure, 'you must give me 1000 piastres, and then it shall be yours.'

Rajeb was shocked at the miser's demand; but the old man, seeing his nephew's anxiety, would not bate of his exorbitant request; and the youth at last agreed, and a bargain was struck.

As Rajeb had left all his money at Cairo, it was agreed that Jousoff should go back with his nephew to that city, and there receive the purchase-money. Accordingly, they set out, and the ass with them. By the way, the creature seemed to be inspired with fresh life, and gamboled and danced, as if to please its new master. Arrived at Cairo, Rajeb gave his uncle the promised sum, and entertained him handsomely. After a few days, Jousoff departed, and left his nephew alone. The latter occupied himself in making a good stall for his ass, and in tending and cleaning it, by which means it soon became quite a new creature. As for the mistress of his heart, Rajeb had almost given up all hope of her. The interval allowed him by the parents had expired, and the youth, now poorer than before, did not dare to present himself before them. Whilst matters stood thus, information was brought to him that his uncle had been found dead by the road-side, having been plundered and killed by robbers. The young man shed a tear for the sudden end of the miser, and then made preparations to go to Tantah, to take up the deceased's inheritance, though there seemed little hope of its proving great, notwithstanding the reputation which Jousoff had once acquired for being rich.

Mounting his ass, Rajeb proceeded to Tantah. He put up the ass in its old stall, and went into the house to search it. As he had almost expected, not a para was to be found: not a vestige of anything valuable was visible in any corner of the wretched abode. While Rajeb was prosecuting his examination, he was surprised by the continued whining and braying of his ass. Thinking he had neglected its wants, he went out several times, and put barley, straw, and water before it; but the animal would not touch them, and continued to stamp on the floor of its stall with its foot. Rajeb's attention was at length attracted to this movement, and the ass, seeing this, repeated it with increased vehemence. Its master, seizing a bar of rusty iron which stood by, then commenced to turn up the ground where the ass struck. As he did this, the animal looked on with eyes glistening with eager pleasure, and seemed as if it would fain say: 'Go on, go on: it is there!' At last, Rajeb came to a coffer. He turned it out, and, behold! it was filled to overflowing with dubbloons, sequins, and all sorts of precious coins.

The youth hugged his treasure, but the ass would not yet let him rest. It struck the ground in another spot with his feet; and Rajeb, on digging anew, found a second coffer, filled with pearls, rubies, emeralds, and other valuable gems.

The ass stamped no more, and Rajeb hastened to secure his treasures, and to get them transported to Cairo. He put them into two panniers, and although they were very heavy, the ass never slackened its speed, nor gave any signs of weariness, until it brought its burden to its master's door. On the night of his arrival, Rajeb hastened to the house of his mistress. He was just in the nick of time, for an old Turk had seen her, and offered the 5000 piastres to the parents. Rajeb, however, took the father home with him, and shewed a part of his treasures, when the marriage was at once agreed on. The young bride proved to be really as virtuous as she was beautiful, and made Rajeb happy. He gave large donations to the poor on the occasion of his wedding. As for the ass, it had the place of honour, during its life, in the stable, and was never doomed to any other toil than that of bearing its mistress and her children. Its master visited the stable every day, and spoke with it as with an old friend.

Behold, in this story, a lesson never to despise animals, but always to be gentle and compassionate to them, for they may often repay a hundredfold the little kindnesses which we do to them.

SLEEP-WALKING.

No phenomenon in the human economy is calculated to excite so much surprise as that called Somnambulism, or Sleep-Walking. If sleep be the intermediate state betwixt wakeful life and death, somnambulism is a condition intermediate betwixt sleep and wakefulness. In perfect sleep, all the organs or faculties composing the mind, together with the external senses and the powers of voluntary motion, are in a state of rest or torpor. Dreaming is a slight approach to wakefulness, seeing that some of the cerebral organs are then in a state of activity, while others are quiescent. In dreaming, the external senses may or may not be in a state of activity. Some people, for example, can be led to dream of particular subjects by the talk of others placed near them when sleeping; while other dreamers are totally insensible to all sounds emitted within the range of their organs of hearing. In ordinary dreaming, too, the powers of voluntary motion are often exercised to a slight extent. A dreamer, under the impression that he is engaged in an active battle, will frequently give a bedfellow a smart belabouring. Often, also, in cases of common dreaming, the muscles on which the production of the voice depends are set in action, through the instrumentality of that portion of the brain which is not in a quiescent state, and the dreamer mutters, or talks, or cries aloud.

All these partial demonstrations of activity in the external senses, and in the powers of voluntary motion, form an approach to that remarkable state termed somnambulism, in which all or nearly all of the senses, and of the muscles of the body, are frequently in perfect activity, the torpor of a part of the cerebral organs being the only feature rendering the condition different from that of waking life. The degrees in which the preceding characteristics are observable in somnambulism, vary, as is natural, in different cases; and the causes of this, as well as of the condition itself, are well and forcibly explained by Mr Macnish in his Anatomy of Sleep. ‘If we dream that we are walking, and the vision possesses such a degree of vividness and exciting energy as to arouse the muscles of locomotion, we naturally get up and walk. Should we dream that we hear or see, and the impression be so vivid as to stimulate the eyes and ears, or, more properly speaking, those parts of the brain which take cognizance of sights and sounds, then we both see any objects, or hear any sounds, which may occur, just as if we were awake. In some cases, the muscles only are excited, and then we simply walk, without hearing or seeing.' In other cases, for the reasons given, we both walk and see; and in a third variety, we at once walk, see, and hear. In the same way, the vocal organs alone may be stimulated, and a person may merely be a sleep-talker; or, under a conjunction of impulses, he may talk, walk, see, and hear.

These brief explanations may aid in preventing the reader from being puzzled by the philosophy of this curious condition of the bodily system, or from being disposed to discredit the cases related. The simplest and perhaps least surprising cases, are those in which the locomotive powers alone of the body are set in action by the vividness of a dreaming impulse. The person rises, strikes his head or body against something, and awakes. A leap from bed is also a comparatively common and slight species of somnambulism. In the belief of being compelled to cross a ditch by the pursuit of a bull, a gentleman bounded some time since from bed, and at one spring found himself placed upon a dressing-table which stood a short way from the foot of the bed. A few inches farther, and he would have passed through, or at least struck, a window. But such cases have little interest in comparison with those in which the somnambulism is not momentary, but of continued duration. The following case is related by Smellie in his Philosophy of Natural History:—'Near thirty years ago, I had an opportunity of examining a striking example of somnambulism. Within a mile of Edinburgh, I happened to reside some time in a farmer's house. Mr Baird, my landlord, had a servant-maid, whose name was Sarah. I was not long there, when I learned from the family that Sarah, particularly after receiving an affront, or being angered, was accustomed to rise in her sleep, to go out, and to walk about the fields. My curiosity was excited, and I begged to be informed the first time that Sarah should rise in her sleep. A few nights afterwards, one of Mr Baird's sons awaked me, and told me that Sarah had got out of bed,

I immediately hastened to the apartment where she slept. When I arrived, Mr and Mrs Baird, one of their sons, and a servant-maid, Sarah's companion, were present. Sarah was in the midst of them. I took my seat by her. We began immediately to converse. She answered any questions that were put to her pretty distinctly ; but she always mistook the person who spoke, which gave us an opportunity of assuming any character within the circle of her acquaintance.

'I knew that one of the farmer's servants, whose name was John Porteous, was a lover of hers ; and therefore I addressed her in the style which I supposed John might have sometimes done. From that moment she began to scold me, and in the most peremptory manner forbade me ever to speak to her again on that topic. The conversation was accordingly changed. I talked of her mistress, who was in the room, because I knew that they had occasional quarrels. Till now, I suspected that the whole was a trick, but for what purpose I could not discover. Sarah, however, abused Mrs Baird in the harshest terms ; she said but the other day she had been accused of stealing and drinking some bottles of ale ; that her mistress was suspicious, cruel, and narrow-minded. As the mistress of the house was present when these and other opprobrious terms were used, I began to be shaken in my preconceived notion of imposture, and therefore changed the object of my experiments and inquiries. I examined her countenance, and found that her eyes, though open, wild, and staring, were not absolutely fixed. I took a pin, and repeatedly pricked her arm ; but not a muscle moved, not a symptom of pain was discoverable. At last she became impatient to leave the room, and made several attempts to get out by the door ; but that was prevented by the domestics. Perceiving her inability to force the door, she made a sudden spring at the window, and endeavoured to throw herself over, which would have been fatal to her. To remove every suspicion of imposture, I desired the people, with proper precautions to prevent harm, to try if she would really precipitate herself from the window. A seemingly free access was left for her escape, which she perceived, and instantly darted with such force and agility, that more than one-half of her body was projected before her friends were aware. They, however, laid hold of her, and prevented the dreadful catastrophe. She was again prevailed upon, though with much reluctance, to sit down. She soon resumed her former calmness, and freely answered such questions as were put to her. This scene continued for more than an hour. I was perfectly convinced, notwithstanding my original suspicions, that the woman was actuated by strong and natural impulses, and not by any design to deceive. I asked if any of the attendants knew how to awaken her. A female servant replied that she did. She immediately, to my astonishment, laid hold of Sarah's wrist; forcibly squeezed and rubbed the projecting bones, calling out at the same time, "Sarah! Sarah!" By this operation, Sarah awoke. She stared with amazement, looked round, and asked how so many people came to be in her apartment at so unseasonable an hour. After she was completely awake, I asked her what was the cause of her restless and violent agitation. She replied, that she had been dreaming that she was pursued by a furious bull, which was every moment on the point of goring her.'

In the preceding case, there is one point worthy of especial note, and this is the insensibility of the girl to pain when her arm was repeatedly pricked. As will be shewn afterwards, this is a phenomenon which has recently thrown quite a novel interest over somnambulism, and made it a subject of greater importance.

The somnambulist in Smellie's case had not apparently the perfect power of vision. She did not or could not recognise the persons about her, yet she saw a window, and would have leaped through it, knowing that a passage was practicable. The true condition of the vision in somnambulism is indeed the point most difficult to comprehend. The boy who, according to the common story, rose in his sleep and took a nest of young eagles from a dangerous precipice, must have received the most accurate accounts of external objects from his visual organs, and must have been able to some extent to reason upon them, else he could never have overcome the difficulties of the ascent. He dreamed of taking away the nest, and to his great surprise found it beneath his bed in the morning in the spot where he only thought himself to have put it in imagination. The following case, mentioned by Mr Macnish, is scarcely less wonderful. It occurred near one of the towns on the Irish coast:—‘About two o’clock in the morning, the watchmen on the Revenue Quay were much surprised at descrying a man disporting himself in the water, about a hundred yards from the shore. Intimation having been given to the revenue boat’s crew, they pushed off, and succeeded in picking him up; but, strange to say, he had no idea whatever of his perilous situation, and it was with the utmost difficulty they could persuade him he was not still in bed. But the most singular part of this novel adventure was, that the man had left his house at twelve o’clock that night, and walked through a difficult, and to him dangerous road, a distance of nearly two miles, and had actually swum one mile and a half when he was fortunately discovered and picked up.’ The state of madness gives us, by analogy, the best explanation of the condition of these climbers and swimmers. With one or more organs or portions of his brain diseased, and the rest sound, the insane person has the perfect use of his external senses, yet may form imperfect conclusions regarding many things around him. The somnambulist, with his senses in activity, but with some of his cerebral organs in a torpid state, is in much the same position as regards his power of forming right judgments on all that he hears or sees.

The story of the sleeping swimmer is borne out by a statement from an indisputable authority—Dr Benjamin Franklin. The doctor relates, that on one occasion, while bathing in a hot salt-water bath, he fell asleep, and floated on his back in that state for nearly an hour, as his watch testified to him.

Sometimes, in the case of a person liable to somnambulism, it is possible to direct the thoughts of the dreamer to any given subject, by acting on the external senses. Smellie, the writer already quoted, gives the subjoined instance:— ‘ Mr Thomas Parkinson, then a student of medicine in the university of Edinburgh, was accustomed to talk and answer questions in his sleep. This fact was known to his companions. To amuse ourselves, two of us went gently into his chamber while he was asleep. We knew that he was in love with a young lady in Yorkshire, the place of his nativity. We whispered her name repeatedly in his ear. He soon began to toss about his hands, and to speak incoherently. He gradually became more calm and collected. His imagination took the direction we intended. He thought he was stationed under the lady’s window, and repeatedly upbraided her for not appearing and speaking to him, as she had so often done on former occasions. At last, he became impatient, started up, laid hold of books, shoes, and everything he could easily grasp. Thinking his mistress was asleep, he threw these articles against the opposite wall of his chamber. By what he said, we learned that his imaginary scene lay in a street, and that he was darting the books and shoes at the lady’s window, in order to awake her. She, however, did not appear; and after tiring himself with frequent exertions, he went quietly into bed without wakening. His eyes were nearly shut; and although he freely conversed with us, he did not seem to perceive that any person was present with him. Next day, we told him what had happened; but he said that he had only a faint recollection of dreaming about his mistress.’

It is consistent with our own knowledge, that many country surgeons, who ride much by night, and pursue a most laborious life generally, sleep perfectly well on horseback. This, however, although a position in which the bodily motion is not entirely passive, is not properly somnambulism. Perhaps the most perfect sleep-walkers were Sir John Moore’s soldiers, many of whom, in the disastrous and fatiguing retreat to Corunna, were observed to fall asleep on the march, and yet to go on, step by step, with their waking companions. Many tradesmen have been known to get up by night and work for a time at their usual employments, without being at all aware in the morning of what they had done. Gall mentions a miller who did this. One of the most extraordinary cases of this order, however, is that of a student of divinity at Bordeaux, who was accustomed to rise in the night-time, and to read and write without the use of his eyes. This case is stated in the French Encyclopédie, under the word Noctambule, and is attested by the Archbishop of Bordeaux. This prelate, in order to test the young man, interposed an obstacle between his eyes and the paper on which he was reading or writing, but he read and wrote with equal facility and equal accuracy as before. Macnish, who repeats this story, does not mention the fact of the eyes not being used, though this is the most marvellous feature in the case. The reading may not have been aloud, and may only have been apparent. But as for the writing accurately without the use of the eyes, this was certainly a feat which few waking persons could have accomplished. In addition to these cases, many others might be gathered, and particularly from Mr Macnish's Anatomy of Sleep; but that book is so accessible, that it is enough to refer to it for further information. We shall only mention one other case which is there given. It is that of Dr Blacklock, who, 'on one occasion rose from bed, to which he had retired at an early hour, came into the room where his family were assembled, conversed with them, and afterwards entertained them with a pleasant song, without any of them suspecting he was asleep, and without his retaining, after he awoke, the least recollection of what he had done.' Being blind, his family would have the more difficulty in discovering his unusual condition.

Somnambulism, it was stated at the close of the farm - servant's case, had of late years assumed a new and more interesting aspect. This has arisen from the discovery—if it be allowable to call it a discovery—that animal magnetism is capable of inducing a peculiar state of somnambulism, and that, during the continuance of that state, sensation or sensibility is destroyed. It has been seen that Smellie found the farm maid-servant to have lost sensibility in her arms. This is a statement corroborative of the account given of magnetic somnambulism. Taking advantage of this absence of sensibility, surgeons, it is said, have performed upon magnetic somnambulists the most severe and painful curative operations, without inflicting on the parties a moment's suffering of the slightest kind. The patient's mind, meanwhile, seems in a perfectly sound and active state, but without the power of remembering anything that passed in the unmagnetised state. A Parisian lady, aged sixty-four, who had a cancerous breast, was magnetised, and it was found that somnambulism could be induced. In her waking state she was deeply averse to an operation; but in her magnetised state it was proposed to her, and she consented at once. The breast was operated upon, and cut off without the slightest seeming pain to her. On waking, she was, it may be believed, much surprised. This case, it has been alleged, is but one of several, where the like has been done; and some of the most respectable medical men of Paris have borne witness to the truth, or at least apparent truth of these allegations. On this score alone, animal magnetism seems worthy of a full and fair inquiry. It would be a wonderful thing, indeed, if we could arrive at means by which all the painful operations to which the human body is rendered liable by disease or accident, could be performed without suffering to those who undergo them.

Somnambulism, or the tendency to it, most commonly arises from causes not apparent or discoverable. Where it occurs in persons not accustomed to exhibit any such propensity, some disorder of the digestive functions may be suspected, and the restoration of these functions to a healthy state may put a stop to the practice. But in confirmed cases, nothing can be done but to lock the doors, bar the windows, and keep dangerous objects or instruments out of the way; or a cord may be affixed to the bedpost and the arm of the sleep-walker. As a general rule, the somnambulist should be taken to bed before being waked.

THE COURSE OF LIFE.

[Translated from a beautiful Spanish poem by Jorge Manrique, on the death of his father, quoted in the thirty-ninth volume of the Edinburgh Review.]

OH! let the soul its slumber break,
Arouse its senses and awake,

To see how soon

Life, with its glories, glides away,
And the stern footstep of decay Comes stealing on.

How pleasure, like the passing wind,
Blows by, and leaves us nought behind

But grief at last;

How still our present happiness
Seems, to the wayward fancy, less Than what is past.

And while we eye the rolling tide,
Down which our flying minutes glide

Away so fast;

Let us the present hour employ,
And deem each future dream of joy
Already past.

Let no vain hope deceive the mind—
No happier let us hope to find
To-morrow than to-day.

Our golden dreams of yore were bright,
Like them, the present shall delight—
Like them, decay.

Our lives like hastening streams must be,
 That into one engulfing sea
     Are doomed to fall ;
 The Sea of Death, whose waves roll on,
 O'er king and kingdom, crown and throne,
     And swallow all.

Alike the river's lordly tide,
 Alike the humble riv'lets glide
     To that sad wave ;
 Death levels poverty and pride,
 And rich and poor sleep side by side
     Within the grave.

Our birth is but a starting-place,
 Life is the running of the race,
     And death the goal :
 There all our steps at last are brought,
 That path alone, of all unsought,
     Is found of all.

Long ere the damps of death can blight,
 The cheek's pure glow of red and white
     Hath passed away :
 Youth smiled, and all was heavenly fair ;
 Age came, and laid his finger there,
     And where are they ?

Where are the strength that mocked decay,
 The step that rose so light and gay,
     The heart's blithe tone !—
 The strength is gone, the step is slow,
 And joy grows weariness and wo,
     When age comes on.

Say, then, how poor and little worth
 Are all those glittering toys of earth
     That lure us here ;
 Dreams of a sleep that death must break.
 Alas ! before it bids us wake,
     Ye disappear.

LAST CENTURY ECCENTRICITIES.

BEAU NASH.

ONE of the most remarkable characters who flourished in England in the early part of the last century, was Richard Nash, better known by the title of Beau Nash. This man's life presents us with an interesting specimen of the strange mixture of ability and folly, virtue and vice, which we occasionally see jumbled together in a single individual. Beau Nash was the son of a poor gentleman in Wales, who endeavoured to give him a good education; but there was a natural spirit of recklessness in the boy, which rendered all his father's well-meant schemes unavailing. After being withdrawn from college, young Nash entered the army as an ensign; tired of this, he next devoted himself to the study of the law; and, at length, tired of this also, he was saved from positive misery, by an event as fortunate as it was unforeseen. Hitherto, having paid extraordinary attention to the cultivation of gentility and an air of extreme fashion, he was reckoned a person every way worthy of filling the situation of master of the ceremonies at Bath; a place whose wells were beginning to attract crowds of visitors. ♦ Nash thus, about the year 1704, became one of the first beaux of an age in which foppery may be said to have had a place among what are called the fine arts.

Behold Beau Nash now at the summit of his glory—superintending the arrangements of balls and concerts—squiring ladies at the pump-rooms—bowing, grimacing, simpering, leering, to all around—dressed in powdered wig, bag, and sword, with hands ruffled and ringed like a Versailles courtier. With all this flummery and nonsense, Nash was a useful wretch. Bath could not have gone on well without him. All such watering-places are liable to the visits of improper characters, whom it is the business of the master of the ceremonies to discover, and prevent from intruding into respectable society. Nash was an extraordinary adept in this kind of employment. He might have been called a living and breathing directory to the Peerage and Commons of the empire. He made himself acquainted with the rank and quality of almost every family in the British dominions. By this means he prevented a vast deal of animosity, and what the last-century authors designate ‘spleen;’ for he regulated place and precedence with the utmost nicety, soothed ruffled vanity, arbitrated in disputes, and repressed irregularities, which, had they been looked over, might have ruined the reputation of the wells. Under his auspices, Bath became the scene of summer recreation for all people of fashion, who bowed to him as a sort of sovereign over the various amusements of the place. The magistrates of the city also found that he was necessary and useful, and took every opportunity of paying the same respect to his fictitious royalty that is generally extorted by real power. His equipage was sumptuous, and he used to travel to Tunbridge in a post-chariot and six greys, with outriders, footmen, French-horns, and every other appendage of expensive parade. He always wore a white hat, and, to apologise for this singularity, said he did it purely to secure it from being stolen; his dress was tawdry, though not perfectly genteel; he might be considered as a beau of several generations; and, in his appearance, he in some measure mixed the fashions of the last age with those of the present. He perfectly understood elegant expense, and generally passed his time in the very best company, if persons of the first distinction deserve that title.

But perhaps the reader may inquire, what finances were to support all this finery, or where the treasures that gave him such frequent opportunities of displaying his benevolence or his vanity? To answer this, we must now enter upon another part of his character—his talents as a gamester; for by gaming alone, at that period of which we speak, he kept up so very genteel an appearance. Wherever people of fashion came, needy adventurers were generally found in waiting. With such Bath swarmed, and among this class Nash was certainly to be numbered in the beginning ; only with this difference, that he wanted the corrupt heart, too commonly attending a life of expedients : for he was generous, humane, and honourable, even though by profession a gamester. But whatever skill Nash might have acquired by a long practice in play, he was not formed by nature for a successful gamester. He was constitutionally passionate and generous. While others made considerable fortunes at the gaming-table, he was ever in the power of chance ; nor did even the intimacy with which he was received by the great, place him in a state of independence. This was certainly a horrid condition of life, and could not probably have been endured by any man of understanding or independent feeling. To render Nash's means of living still more precarious and discreditable, a law was passed —this was in the reign of George II.—to suppress public gaming-tables ; and in future the arbiter of the elegances at Bath had to depend principally on what he could pick up at private parties.

Never was there a more striking instance of imprudent generosity than was exemplified by Beau Nash. He was the best - hearted creature in the world ; his purse was ever open to the distressed. No matter what were his own exigencies, or the claims upon him by creditors, he would at any time have emptied his pockets to save applicants from a state of unhappiness. As for being just before being generous, that was what he had not the most distant conception of. On one occasion, overhearing a poor beggar - man on the street say to his wife : ' How happy should we be had we ten pounds ! that sum would make us right for life,' instantly his hand was in his pocket, and pulling forth the sum in question, presented it to the man, saying : ' There is what you want—go, be happy ! ' and hastened off without waiting to be thanked. On another occasion, he, in the same manner, and for a similar reason, gave a gentleman who had been ruined at the gaming-table, the sum of L.200. But the most remarkable instance of this species of insanity—for it can be called nothing else—took place in the following manner:—He was waited on one day by a gentleman of his acquaintance, who told him ‘he had just come from seeing the most pitiable sight his eyes ever beheld—a poor man and his wife, surrounded with seven helpless infants, almost all perishing for want of food, raiment, and lodging; their apartment was as dreary as the street itself, from the weather breaking in upon them at all quarters; that, upon inquiry, he found the parents were honest and sober, and wished to be industrious if they had employment; that he had calculated the expense of making the whole family comfortable and happy.’ ‘How much money,’ exclaimed Nash, ‘would relieve them and make them happy?’ ‘About ten guineas,’ replied the friend, ‘would be sufficient for the purpose.’ Nash instantly went to his bureau, and gave him the cash, at the same time pressing him to make all possible haste, for fear of the sudden dissolution of the miserable family. ‘I need not go far,’ said the friend smiling, and putting the money into his pocket. ‘You know you have owed me this money a long while—that I have dunned you for it for years to no manner of purpose: excuse me, therefore, that I have thus imposed on your feelings, not being able to move your justice, for there are no such objects as I have described, to my knowledge. The story is a fiction from beginning to end: you are a dupe, not of justice, but of your own humanity.’

The consequences which ensued from the want of a regular means of subsistence, and this heedless extravagance, were such as might have been anticipated: he was in poverty and debt. Hence, he grew peevish and fretful; and as old age approached, he became insolent and offensive. No longer the gay, thoughtless, idly-industrious creature he once was, he now forgot how to supply new modes of entertainment, and became too rigid to wind with ease through the vicissitudes of fashion. The evening of his life began to grow cloudy. His fortune was gone, and nothing but poverty lay in prospect. He now began to want that charity which he had never refused to any, and to find that a life of dissipation and gaiety is ever terminated by misery and regret. He was now past the power of giving or receiving pleasure, for he was poor, old, and peevish; yet still he was incapable of turning from his former manner of life to pursue happiness. An old man thus striving after pleasure, is indeed an object of pity; but a man at once old and poor, running on in this pursuit, certainly excites astonishment.

Those who pass a life without reflection, are generally made to think with bitterness before leaving the stage of existence. It must be a dreadful thing for a man on his deathbed, to feel a conviction that he has spent his life in folly, and that he has done little or nothing which he can look back upon with pleasure: yet there are hundreds who, for the sake of momentary gratifications, prepare for themselves this species of retrospect. Such was Nash. His health began to fail, notwithstanding that he had received from nature a robust and happy constitution, that was scarcely even to be impaired by intemperance. For some time before his decease, nature gave warning of his approaching dissolution. The worn machine had run itself down to an utter impossibility of repair; he saw that he must die, and shuddered at the thought. Fortitude was not among the number of his virtues. Anxious, timid, his thoughts still hanging on a receding world, he desired to enjoy a little longer that life, the miseries of which he had experienced so long. The poor unsuccessful gamester husbanded the wasting moments with an increased desire to continue the game, and to the last, eagerly wished for one yet more happy throw. He died in February 1761, at the advanced age of eighty-seven, leaving behind him a few books, trinkets, and pictures, which had been given to him as presents.

BRUNTFIELD:

A TALE OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

THE war carried on in Scotland, by the friends and enemies of Queen Mary, after her departure into England, was productive of an almost complete dissolution of order, and laid the foundation of many feuds, which were kept up by private families and individuals long after all political cause of hostility had ceased. Among the most remarkable quarrels which history or tradition has recorded as arising out of that civil broil, I know of none so deeply cherished or accompanied by so many romantic and peculiar circumstances, as one which took place between two old families of gentry in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh. Stephen Bruntfield, Laird of Craighouse, had been a zealous and disinterested partisan of the queen. Robert Moubray of Barnbougle was the friend successively of Murray and Morton, and distinguished himself very highly in their cause. During the year 1572, when Edinburgh Castle was maintained by Kirkaldy of Grange in behalf of the queen, Stephen Bruntfield held out Craighouse in the same interest, and suffered a siege from a detachment of the forces of the regent, commanded by the Laird of Barnbougle. This latter baron, a man of fierce and brutal nature, entered life as a younger brother, and at an early period chose to cast his fate among the Protestant leaders, with a view of improving his fortunes. The death of his elder brother in rebellion at Langside, enabled the Regent Murray to reward his services with a grant of the patrimonial estate, of which he did not scruple to take possession by the strong hand, to the exclusion of his infant niece, the daughter of the late proprietor. Some incidents which occurred in the course of the war had inspired a mutual hatred of the most intense character into the breasts of Bruntfeld and Moubray; and it was therefore with a feeling of strong personal animosity, as well as of political rancour, that the latter undertook the task of watching the motions of Bruntfield at Craighouse. Bruntfield, after holding out for many months, was obliged, along with his friends in Edinburgh Castle, to yield to the party of the regent. Like Kirkaldy and Maitland of Lethington, he surrendered upon a promise of life and estate; but while his two friends perished, one by the hand of the executioner, the other by his own hand, he fell a victim to the sateless spite of his personal enemy, who, in conducting him to Edinburgh as a prisoner, took fire at some bitter expression on the part of the captive, and smote him dead upon the spot.

Bruntfield left a widow and three infant sons. The Lady of Craighouse had been an intimate of the unfortunate Mary, from her early years; was educated with her in France, in the Catholic faith; and had left her court to become the wife of Bruntfield. It was a time calculated to change the natures of women, as well as of men. The severity with which her religion was treated in Scotland, the wrongs of her royal mistress, and, finally, the sufferings and death of her husband, acting upon a mind naturally enthusiastic, all conspired to alter the character of Marie Carmichael, and substitute for the rosy hues of her early years, the gloom of the sepulchre and the penitentiary. She continued, after the restoration of peace, to reside in the house of her late husband; but though it was within two miles of the city, she did not for many years reappear in public. With no society but that of her children, and the persons necessary to attend upon them, she mourned in secret over past events, seldom stirring from a particular apartment, which, in accordance with a fashion by no means uncommon, she had caused to be hung with black, and which was solely illuminated by a lamp. In the most rigorous observances of her faith, she was assisted by a priest, whose occasional visits formed almost the only intercourse which she maintained with the external world. One strong passion gradually acquired a complete sway over her mind — REVENGE ; a passion which the practice of the age had invested with a conventional respectability, and which no kind of religious feeling, then known, was able either to check or soften. So entirely was she absorbed by this fatal passion, that her very children at length ceased to have interest or merit in her eyes, except in so far as they appeared likely to be the means of gratifying it. One after another, as they reached the age of fourteen, she sent them to France, in order to be educated ; but the accomplishment to which they were enjoined to direct their principal attention, was that of martial exercises. The eldest, Stephen, returned at eighteen, a strong and active youth, with a mind of little polish or literary information, but considered a perfect adept at sword-play. As his mother surveyed his noble form, a smile stole into the desert of her wan and widowed face, as a winter sunbeam wanders over a waste of snows. But it was a smile of more than motherly pride : she was estimating the power which that frame would have in contending with the murderous Moubray. She was not alone pleased with the handsome figure of her first-born child ; but she thought with a fiercer and faster joy upon the appearance which it would make in the single combat against the slayer of his father. Young Bruntfield, who having been from his earliest years trained to the purpose now contemplated by his mother, rejoiced in the prospect, now lost no time in preferring before the king a charge of murder against the Laird of Barnbougle, whom he at the same time challenged, according to a custom then not altogether abrogated, to prove his innocence in single combat. The king having granted the necessary licence, the fight took place in the royal park, near the palace ; and, to the surprise of all assembled, young Bruntfield fell under the powerful sword of his adversary. The intelligence was communicated to his mother at Craighouse, where she was found in her darkened chamber, prostrate before an image of the Virgin. The priest who had been commissioned to break the news, opened his discourse in a tone intended to prepare her for the worst ; but she cut him short at the very beginning with a frantic exclamation : ‘ I know what you would tell : the murderer’s sword has prevailed, and there are now but two, instead of three, to redress their father’s wrongs ! ’ The melancholy incident, after the first burst of feeling, seemed only to have concentrated and increased that passion by which she had been engrossed for so many years. She appeared to feel that the death of her eldest son only formed an addition to that debt which it was the sole object of her existence to see discharged. ‘ Roger,’ she said, ‘ will have the death of his brother, as well as that of his father, to avenge. Animated by such a double object, his arm can hardly fail to be successful.’

Roger returned about two years after, a still handsomer, more athletic, and more accomplished youth than his brother. Instead of being daunted by the fate of Stephen, he burned but the more eagerly to wipe out the injuries of his house with the blood of Moubray. On his application for a licence being presented to the court, it was objected by the crown lawyers that the case had been already closed by mal fortune of the former challenger. But while this was the subject of their deliberation, the applicant caused so much annoyance and fear in the court circle by the threats which he gave out against the enemy of his house, that the king, whose inability to procure respect either for himself or for the law is well known, thought it best to decide in favour of his claim. Roger Bruntfield, therefore, was permitted to fight in barras with Moubray ; but the same fortune attended him as that which had already deprived the widow of her first child. Slipping his foot in the midst of the combat, he reeled to the ground, embarrassed by his cumbrous armour. Moubray, according to the barbarous practice of the age, immediately sprang upon and despatched him. ‘ Heaven’s will be done ! ’ said the widow, when she heard of the fatal incident ; ‘ but, gratias Deo ! there still remains another chance.’

Henry Bruntfield, the third and last surviving son, had all along been the favourite of his mother. Though apparently cast in a softer mould than his two elder brothers, and bearing all the marks of a gentler and more amiable disposition, he in reality cherished the hope of avenging his father's death more deeply in the recesses of his heart, and longed more ardently to accomplish that deed, than any of his brothers. His mind, naturally susceptible of the softest and tenderest impressions, had contracted the enthusiasm of his mother's wish in its strongest shape; as the fairest garments are capable of the deepest stain. The intelligence, which reached him in France, of the death of his brothers, instead of bringing to his heart the alarm and horror which might have been expected, only braced him to the adventure which he now knew to be before him. From this period, he forsook the elegant learning which he had heretofore delighted to cultivate. His nights were spent in poring over the memoirs of distinguished knights—his days were consumed in the tilt-yard of the sword-player. In due time he entered the French army, in order to add to mere science that practical hardihood, the want of which he conceived to be the cause of the death of his brothers. Though the sun of chivalry was now declining far in the occident, it was not yet altogether set: Montmorency was but just dead; Bayard was still alive—Bayard, the knight of all others who has merited the motto, sans peur et sans reproche. Of the lives and actions of such men, Henry Bruntfield was a devout admirer and imitator. No young knight kept a firmer seat upon his horse—none complained less of the severities of campaigning—none cherished lady's love with a fonder, purer, or more devout sensation. On first being introduced at the court of Henry III., he had signalled, as a matter of course, Catherine Moubrey, the disinherited niece of his father's murderer, who had been educated in a French convent by her other relatives, and was now provided for in the household of the queen. The connection of this young lady with the tale of his own family, and the circumstance of her being a sufferer in common with himself by the wickedness of one individual, would have been enough to create a deep interest respecting her in his breast. But when, in addition to these circumstances, we consider that she was beautiful, was highly accomplished, and in many other respects, qualified to engage his affections, we can scarcely be surprised that that was the result of their acquaintance. Upon one point alone did these two interesting persons ever think differently. Catherine, though inspired by her friends from infancy with an entire hatred of her cruel relative, contemplated, with fear and aversion, the prospect of her lover being placed against him in deadly combat, and did all in her power to dissuade him from his purpose. Love, however, was of little avail against the still more deeply rooted passion which had previously occupied his breast. Flowers thrown upon a river might have been as effectual in staying its course towards the cataract, as the gentle entreaties of Catherine Moubray in withholding Henry Bruntfield from the enterprise for which his mother had reared him—for which his brothers had died—for which he had all along moved and breathed.

At length, accomplished with all the skill which could then be acquired in arms, glowing with all the earnest feelings of youth, Henry returned to Scotland. On reaching his mother's dwelling, she clasped him, in a transport of varied feeling, to her breast, and for a long time could only gaze upon his elegant person. 'My last and dearest,' she at length said, 'and thou, too, art to be adventured upon this perilous course! Much have I bethought me of the purpose which now remains to be accomplished. I have not been without a sense of dread lest I be only doing that which is to sink my soul in flames at the day of reckoning; but yet there has been that which comforts me also. Only yesternight, I dreamed that your father appeared before me. In his hand he held a bow and three goodly shafts—at a distance appeared the fierce and sanguinary Moubray. He desired me to shoot the arrows at that arch-traitor, and I gladly obeyed. A first and a second he caught in his hand, broke, and trampled on with contempt. But the third shaft, which was the fairest and goodliest of all, pierced his guilty bosom, and he immediately expired. The revered shade at this gave me an encouraging smile, and withdrew. My Henry, thou art that third arrow, which is at length to avail against the shedder of our blood! The dream seems a revelation, given especially that I may have comfort in this enterprise, otherwise so revolting to a mother's feelings.'

Young Bruntfield saw that his mother's wishes had only imposed upon her reason; but he made no attempt to break the charm by which she was actuated, being glad, upon any terms, to obtain her sanction for that adventure to which he was himself impelled by feelings considerably different. He therefore began, in the most deliberate manner, to take measures for bringing on the combat with Moubray. The same legal objections which had stood against the second duel were maintained against the third; but public feeling was too favourable to the object to be easily withheld. The Laird of Barnbougle, though somewhat past the bloom of life, was still a powerful and active man, and, instead of expressing any fear to meet this third and more redoubted warrior, rather longed for a combat which promised, if successful, to make him one of the most renowned swordsmen of his time. He had also heard of the attachment which subsisted between Bruntfield and his niece; and, in the contemplation of an alliance which might give some force to the claims of that lady upon his estate, found a deeper and more selfish reason for accepting the challenge of his youthful enemy. King James himself protested against stretching the law of the per duellum so far; but sensible that there would be no peace between either the parties or their adherents till it should be decided in a fair combat, he was fain to grant the required licence.

The fight was appointed to take place on Cramond Inch, a low grassy island in the Firth of Forth, near the Castle of Barnbougle. All the preparations were made in the most approved manner by the young Duke of Lennox, who had been the friend of Bruntfield in France. On a level space, close to the northern beach of the islet, a space was marked off, and strongly secured by a paling. The spectators, who were almost exclusively gentlemen (the rabble not being permitted to approach), sat upon a rising-ground beside the enclosure, while the space towards the sea was quite clear. At one end, surrounded by his friends, stood the Laird of Barnbougle, a huge and ungainly figure, whose features displayed a mixture of ferocity and hypocrisy, in the highest degree unpleasing. At the other, also attended by a host of family allies and friends, stood the gallant Henry Bruntfield, who, if divested of his armour, might have realised the idea of a winged Mercury. A seat was erected close beside the barras for the Duke of Lennox and other courtiers, who were to act as judges; and at a little distance upon the sea lay a small decked vessel, with a single female figure on board. After all the proper ceremonies which attended this strange legal custom had been gone through, the combatants advanced into the centre, and, planting foot to foot, each with his heavy sword in his hand, awaited the command which should let them loose against each other, in a combat which both knew would only be closed with the death of one or other. The word being given, the fight commenced. Moubrey, almost at the first pass, gave his adversary a cut in the right limb, from which the blood was seen to flow profusely. But Bruntfield was enabled, by this mishap, to perceive the trick upon which his adversary chiefly depended, and, by taking care to avoid it, put Moubrey nearly hors de combat. The fight then proceeded for a few minutes, without either gaining the least advantage over the other. Moubrey was able to defend himself pretty successfully from the cuts and thrusts of his antagonist, but he could make no impression in return. The question, then, became one of time. It was evident that, if no lucky stroke should take effect beforehand, he who first became fatigued with the exertion would be the victim. Moubrey felt his disadvantage as the elder and bulkier man, and began to fight most desperately, and with less caution. One tremendous blow, for which he seemed to have gathered his last strength, took effect upon Bruntfield, and brought him upon his knee, in a half-stupified state; but the elder combatant had no strength to follow up the effort. He reeled towards his youthful and sinking enemy, and stood for a few moments over him, vainly endeavouring to raise his weapon for another and final blow. Ere he could accomplish his wish, Bruntfield recovered sufficient strength to draw his dagger, and thrust it up to the hilt beneath the breastplate of his exhausted foe. The murderer of his race instantly lay dead beside him, and a shout of joy from the spectators hailed him as the victor. At the same instant, a scream of more than earthly note arose from the vessel anchored near the island; a lady descended from its side into a boat, and rowing to the land, rushed up to the bloody scene, where she fell upon the neck of the conqueror, and pressed him with the most frantic eagerness to her bosom. The widow of Stephen Bruntfield at length found the yearnings of twenty years fulfilled—she saw the murderer of her husband, the slayer of her two sons, dead on the sward before her, while there still survived to her as noble a child as ever blessed a mother's arms. But the revulsion of feeling produced by the event was too much for her strength; or, rather, Providence, in its righteous judgment, had resolved that so unholy a feeling as that of revenge should not be too signally gratified. She expired in the arms of her son, murmuring, 'Nunc dimittis, Domine,' with her latest breath.

The remainder of the tale of Bruntfield may be easily told. After a decent interval, the young Laird of Craighouse married Catherine Moubray; and as the king saw it right to restore that young lady to a property originally forfeited for service to his mother, the happiness of the parties might be considered as complete. A long life of prosperity and peace was granted to them by the kindness of Heaven; and at their death, they had the satisfaction of enjoying that greatest of all earthly blessings— the love and respect of a numerous and virtuous family.

The tale of Bruntfield is founded upon facts alluded to in the following extracts :—

(From Birrel's Diary.)

'1596, the 22d day of December, Stephin Bruntfield slain upon St Leonard's Craiges, as apeiris, be James Carmichael, second son of the Laird of Carmichael' [ancestor of the Hyndford family.]

'1597, the 15th of March, the single combat foughтен betwixt Adam Bruntfield and James Carmichael; the said Adam challenged James Carmichael for murthering of his umq<sup>le</sup> brothir Stephin Bruntfield, captain of Tantallon. The said Adam purchased a licence of his majesty, and fought the said James in Barnbougle Links before about 5000 gentlemen; and the said Adam, although but ane young man, and of mean stature, slew the said James Carmichael, he being as able a lyke man as was living.'

(From Anderson's History of Scotland, M.S. Adv. Lib.)

'Thair met in ane small inche by the sea, near to Barnbougle, my lord duke and sundry otheris being their judges.' The same work proceeds to state, that Carmichael first struck Bruntfield in 'the lisk' (loin), which was returned with a stroke that felled Carmichael to the earth; Bruntfield then leapt upon the body of his adversary and despatched him with his dagger. He was then conducted back to the city with acclamations.'

(From Notes of a Conversation on Local Antiquities, with Sir Walter Scott, December 17, 1824.)

'We spoke of Bruntsfield Links, an extensive downs in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh. Sir Walter said, that, in his young days, there was a stone near the upper end of that common, which was pointed out as the scene of a remarkable murder which took place at the end of the sixteenth century. The name of the murderer was Carmichael—of the slain man, Bruntfield; and from this latter individual the common was said to have derived its name. According to tradition, the widow of Bruntfield had three sons, all of whom she brought up with the duty of revenging their father's death inculcated upon them, and with the view that each, as he successively reached the years of manhood, should challenge and fight Carmichael. Two did this, and met with their father's fate ; but the youngest obtained leave from the king to fight Carmichael in public lists on the island of Cramond, where a vast assemblage of people, from every part of Scotland, met to witness the combat. Carmichael, though a tall and powerful man compared with his opponent, was killed on the spot.'

A PARISIAN MERCHANT.

IT is worthy of observation, that the great majority of the benefactors of the poorer classes have been persons who themselves had to struggle with the hardships of life, and who have owed only to industry, to order, and economy, the happiness of being able to assist their fellow-creatures. Men born to wealth and greatness, are too often ignorant of the privations and wretchedness of their inferiors ; but those who have undergone similar trials and difficulties, are taught to look upon those beneath them with that intelligent eye which a common feeling alone can give : they learn to discover and to divine their wants, and know, by the experienced misery, the point to which relief can best be applied.

A new and striking proof of the truth of this assertion was afforded by a paragraph in the French papers of the month of February 1840, which, in announcing the death of a man hitherto known only within a narrow circle, told also of a bequest to a very large amount, to be appropriated to the opening of an asylum for a class of persons whose necessities he was able, for the reasons above mentioned, accurately to estimate, and of whose excellent qualities he wished to prove his appreciation—that class was the clerks of the city of Paris.

Charles Lawrence Donaud was born at Paris, the 10th of August 1762, of one of those old families who did honour to commerce by irreproachable integrity. Having distinguished himself at the college of Harcourt, he began the study of the law, and was received, while still a young man, as advocate in the French parliament; but soon his natural bias for the profession of his fathers made him repair to England, the commercial fame of which led him thither, in ardent desire for information.

Having returned to his own country, after a six years' absence, he founded at Paris a new establishment, which soon became flourishing. The property bequeathed to him by his father, considerable in that day, enabled him to enlarge his commercial relations. But the Revolution began, and despoiled him of everything—not only of a great part of his patrimony, but of all that he had acquired by commerce, so that he might be regarded as utterly ruined.

Happily, our merchant did not suffer himself to be cast down by this reverse of fortune. Endowed with a strong mind, with indefatigable perseverance, no sooner did better days dawn than he began again his commercial engagements, which his industry rendered lucrative, and in which he had the advantage of a credit which he had established by his probity, his undeviating exactitude, and his many other estimable qualities. One of his favourite maxims was: that ‘if industry lays the foundation of fortune, economy must raise the superstructure;’ and so faithfully did he adhere to this principle, that he was never known to waste, in what could minister merely to luxury, the fruits of his labours.

Though blunt in manner, Donaud was most benevolent, tender-hearted, and generous. He had a real attachment for those who served him with zeal and perseverance, and his last will was dictated by a desire to leave proofs of that attachment to such of them as should survive him. In a note-book kept by him, the following entry was found, bearing date July 18, 1829 : ‘L——, my faithful cashier, died this morning after an illness of thirty-eight days, and the Society of Merchant Clerks have performed the last rites, and defrayed the expenses of his funeral. L—— had exercised the office of cashier in my establishment for thirty-five years, without my ever having discovered the slightest inaccuracy or incorrectness in the immense receipts that passed through his hands during all that period of time. So little did I reckon upon surviving him, that in my will, I had left him his full salary for life, and also a sum of money over and above, so as to place him quite at his ease. Man proposes, and God disposes.’

This cashier, the immediate object of the solicitude of Donaud, had been obliged during his illness to go to an hospital where, from the circumstance of there being a great crowd of patients, he had perhaps not met with the needful care. This occurrence was doubtless the origin of his desire to provide a special asylum for that class—‘a class,’ so the will runs, ‘so useful to the banker and the merchant, the members of which, for a trifling salary, pass frequently their whole life in preserving the fortunes and credit of bankers and merchants by their rigid accuracy and integrity in discharging the trust reposed in them; and this, too, with so little certainty of a provision for themselves in case of sickness or old age.’

Donaud had no children; he bequeathed the half of his fortune to found an asylum, which, under the name of ‘Asylum for the Clerks of Paris,’ might receive to the number of ten, infirm, sick, and superannuated patients from that class, taken from the banking and commercial houses of Paris. This act of beneficence is worthy of being remembered, and imitated as regards those aged and necessitous, who, notwithstanding all efforts to the contrary, are in their old days left stranded by misfortune.

CRUISE OF THE SALDANHA AND TALBOT.

THE following attempt to describe a scene which it has seldom been the lot of man both to witness and to survive, will possess a melancholy interest from the associations with which it is connected. We will only premise, by assuring the reader that the narrative is perfectly authentic, and was penned in a communication to a friend in Edinburgh, in almost the very words here set down. Some of our readers perhaps may remember of an extract from it appearing in the Edinburgh newspapers of the time, being inserted for the purpose of allaying the fears of friends and relatives in that quarter, for the safety of those whom common report had, not irrationally, consigned to a watery grave :—

Lochswilly, Dec. 10, 1811, H. M. S. Talbot.

At mid-day of Saturday the 30th ultimo, with a fair wind and a smooth sea, we weighed from our station here, in company with the Saldanha frigate of thirty-eight guns (Captain Pakenham, with a crew of 300 men), on a cruise, as was intended, of twenty days—the Saldanha taking a westerly course, while we stood in the opposite direction. We had scarcely got out of the loch and cleared the heads, however, when we plunged at once into all the miseries of a gale of wind blowing from the west. During the three following days, it continued to increase in violence, when the islands of Coll and Tiree* became visible to us. As the wind had now chopped round more to the north, and continued unabated in violence, the danger of getting involved among the numerous small islands and rugged headlands on the north-west coast of Inverness-shire became evident. It was therefore deemed expedient to wear the ship round, and make a port with all expedition. With this view, and favoured by the wind, a course was shaped for Lochswilly ; and away we scudded under close-reefed foresail and main-topsail, followed by a tremendous sea, which threatened every moment to overwhelm us, and accompanied by piercing showers of hail, and a gale which blew with incredible fury. The same course was steered until next day about noon, when land was seen on the lee-bow. The weather being thick, some time elapsed before it could be distinctly made out, and it was then ascertained to be the island of North Arran, on the coast of Donegal, westward of Lochswilly. The ship was therefore hauled up some points, and we yet entertained hopes of reaching an anchorage before nightfall, when the weather gradually thickened, and the sea, now that we were upon a wind, broke over us in all directions. Its violence was such, that in a few minutes several of our ports were stove in, at which the water poured in in great abundance, until it was actually breast-high, on the lee-side of the main-deck. Fortunately, but little got below, and the ship was relieved by taking in the foresail. But a dreadful addition was now made to the precariousness of our situation, by the cry of ‘ Land ahead ! ’ which was seen from the forecastle, and must have been very near. Not a moment was now lost in wearing the ship round on the other tack, and making what little sail could be carried, to weather the land we had already passed. This soon proved, however, to be a forlorn prospect, for it was found we should run our distance by ten o’clock. All the horrors of shipwreck now stared us in the face, aggravated tenfold by the extreme darkness of the night, and the tremendous force of the wind, which now blew a hurricane. Mountains are insignificant when speaking of the sea that kept pace with it ; its violence was awful beyond description, and it frequently broke over all the poor little ship, that shivered and groaned, but behaved admirably.

The force of the sea may be guessed from the fact of the sheet-anchor, nearly a ton and a half in weight, being actually lifted on board, to say nothing of the forechain-plates board broken, both gangways torn away, quarter-galleries stove in, &c. &c. In short, on getting into port, the vessel was found to be loosened through all her frame, and leaking at every seam. As far as depended on her good qualities, however, I felt assured at the time we were safe, for I had seen enough of the Talbot to be convinced we were in one of the finest sea-boats that ever swam. But what could all the skill of the ship-builder avail in a situation like ours? With a night full fifteen hours long before us, and knowing that we were fast driving on the land, anxiety and dread were on every face, and every mind felt the terrors of uncertainty and suspense. At length, about twelve o'clock, the dreadful truth was disclosed to us. Judge of my sensations when I saw the surf and the frowning rocks of Arran, scarcely half a mile distant on our lee-bow! To our inexpressible relief, and not less to our surprise, we fairly weathered all, and were congratulating each other on our escape, when on looking forward, I imagined I saw breakers at no great distance on our lee; and this suspicion was soon confirmed, when the moon, which shone at intervals, suddenly broke out from behind a cloud, and presented to us a most terrific spectacle. At not more than a quarter of a mile's distance on our lee-beam, appeared a range of tremendous breakers, amongst which it seemed as if every sea would throw us. Their height, it may be guessed, was prodigious, when they could be clearly distinguished from the foaming waters of the surrounding ocean. It was a scene seldom to be witnessed, and never forgotten! ‘Lord have mercy on us!’ was now on the lips of every one—destruction seemed inevitable. Captain Swaine, whose coolness I have never seen surpassed, issued his orders clearly and collectedly when it was proposed, as a last resource, to drop the anchors, cut away the masts, and trust to the chance of riding out the gale. This scheme was actually determined on, and everything was in readiness, but happily was deferred until an experiment was tried aloft. In addition to the close-reefed main-topsail and foresail, the fore-topsail andtrysail were now set, and the result was almost magical. With a few plunges, we cleared not only the reef, but a huge rock, upon which I could with ease have tossed a biscuit; and in a few minutes we were inexpressibly rejoiced to observe both far astern.

We had now miraculously escaped all but certain destruction a second time, but much was yet to be feared. We had still to pass Cape Jeller, and the moments dragged on in gloomy apprehension and anxious suspense. The ship carried sail most wonderfully, and we continued to go along at the rate of seven knots, shipping very heavy seas, and labouring much—all with much solicitude looking out for daylight. The dawn at length appeared, and to our great joy we saw the land several miles astern, having passed the Cape and many other hidden dangers during the darkness. Matters on the morning of the 5th assumed a very different aspect from the last two days' experience : the wind gradually subsided, and with it the sea, and a favourable breeze now springing up, we were enabled to make a good offing. I have nothing further worth mentioning respecting ourselves, than that we anchored here this morning, all safe. Fortunately, no accident of consequence occurred, although several of our people were severely bruised by falls. Poor fellows! they certainly suffered enough: not a dry stitch, not a dry hammock, have they had since we sailed. Happily, however, their misfortunes are soon forgot in a dry shirt and a can of grog. Now, they are singing as jovially as if they had just returned from a pleasure-cruise.

The most melancholy part of my narrative is still to be told. On coming up to our anchorage here this morning, we observed an unusual degree of curiosity and bustle in the fort: crowds of people were congregated on both sides, running to and fro, examining us through spy-glasses; in short, an extraordinary commotion was apparent. The meaning of all this was but too soon made known to us by a boat coming alongside, from which we learned that the unfortunate Saldanha had gone to pieces, and every man perished ! Our own destruction had likewise been reckoned inevitable from the time of the discovery of the unhappy fate of our consort, five days beforehand ; and hence the astonishment excited at our unexpected return. From all that could be learned concerning the dreadful catastrophe, I am inclined to believe, that the Saldanha had been driven on the rocks about the time our doom appeared so certain in another quarter. Her lights were seen by the signal-tower at nine o'clock of that fearful Wednesday night, December 4, after which it is supposed she went ashore on the rocks at a small bay called Ballymastaker, almost at the entrance of Lochswilly Harbour. Next morning, the beach was strewed with fragments of the wreck, and upwards of 200 of the bodies of the unfortunate sufferers were found washed ashore. One man—and one only—out of the 300 is ascertained to have come ashore alive, but almost in a state of insensibility. Unhappily, there was no person present to administer to his wants judiciously, and upon craving something to drink, about half a pint of whisky was given him by the country people, which almost instantly killed him ! Poor Pakenham's body was only recognised this morning amidst the others, and, like these, stripped quite naked by the inhuman wretches, who flocked to the wreck as to a blessing ! It is even suspected that he came on shore alive, but was stripped, and left to perish ! Nothing could equal the audacity of the plunderers, although a party of the Lanark Militia was doing duty around the wreck. But this is an ungracious and revolting subject, which no one of proper feeling would wish to dwell upon. Still less am I inclined to describe the heart-rending scene at Buncrana, where the widows of many of the sufferers are residing. The surgeon's wife, a native of Halifax, has never spoken since the dreadful tidings arrived. Consolation is inadmissible, and no one has yet ventured to offer it.

CULTIVATIONS.

ALL men are not agriculturists, horticulturists, or arboriculturists ; but yet almost all men are cultivators. By this it is meant, that men in general cultivate, or coax, or unduly appreciate and fondle, some particular feature of their persons, or else, perhaps, some integument connected with their persons, to such a degree as to be rather conspicuous, while to everything else they only give the ordinary degree of attention. There are many features of human nature which remain to be detected and described ; and this is one—cultivations. So far as I am aware, no one ever thought of pointing it out to mankind ; the subject of cultivation has hitherto remained totally uncultivated. So it shall be no longer.

Hair, as the only part of the person which actually grows like a vegetable, is naturally a large subject of cultivation. The Cavaliers long ago cultivated love-locks, which they kept hanging down in graceful fashion from their temples. These locks, or curls, are now changed for tufts, or bunches of hair, which the young men cultivate at the same place, and are ever shaking up and teding, exactly as if it were a crop of hay instead of hair. Mark a modern beau as he walks along the street, and you will observe at one glance that the principal part of the man, the heart—the sensorium—the cynosure—the point from which all the rest evolves—the root of the man, in short, is the tuft under the right rim of his hat. All the rest of him is a mere pendulum, vibrating from this axis. As he walks along, he hardly feels that any other part of him is in existence, besides that. But he feels his tuft most intensely. Thought, feeling, everything, lies concentrated in that ; head, body, and limbs, are all alike mere members devolved from it. If you were to cut off the side-bunch of a modern beau in his sleep, he would, for the time, be utterly ruined.

It would be like the polypus, deprived of everything but a single leg ; and he would require several months of dormant existence—that is, retirement from the streets—to let the better part of him grow out again from the worse, which had remained behind. Let not the demure Puritan, however, think that the joke lies all against the gay cavalier or beau. There may be as much of the sin of cultivation in the stroked and glossy hair of the Roundhead, or plain man, as in the love-locks and bunches of their antipodes in sentiment. I have seen some men, who affected to be very unaffected, cultivate a peak on the top and centre of their brows as sedulously, and with as much inward gratulation on account of it, as ever I saw a dandy cultivate a tuft or train a side-curl. It must be understood that there are cultivations of a negative character, as well as of a positive, and he who is guiltless of cultivation in his heart is alone guiltless. Next to curls, stand whiskers. What a field of cultivation have we there ! The whisker is a bounty of nature, which man does not like to refuse taking advantage of. The thing presses upon him—it is there; and to put it altogether aside, except upon the demand of temporary fashion, is scarcely to be thought of. Some men, however, are more able to resist the demon of whiskers than others. There are some men so prone to the temptations of this fiend, that they enlarge and enlarge their field of cultivation, by small and imperceptible degrees, till at length the whole chin falls a prey, excepting, perhaps, a small bit about the mouth—just enough to preserve the cultivator within the pale of the Christian church. Sometimes the Whisker Fiend makes an insidious advance or sally up towards the corners of the mouth ; and there—in those small creeks or promontories—does the sin of cultivation invariably flourish more proud and rampant than anywhere else. The whisker of the cheek is a broad, honest, candid, downright cultivation ; but that down about the corners of the mouth is a sly and most impish one—a little pet sin, apt to beset its cultivator in a far less resistible fashion than any other ; and it may indeed be said, that he who has given himself fairly up to this crime, is almost beyond redemption.

There are some men who cultivate white hands, with long fair nails. For nothing else do they care very particularly—all is well, if only their hands be neat. There is even a ridiculous notion, that elegant hands are the most unequivocal test of what is called good birth. I can say, for my own part, that the finest hands I ever saw belonged to a woman who kept a butcher's shop in Musselburgh. So much for the nonsense about fine hands. Then there is a set of people who cultivate a ring on a particular finger—evidently regretting, from their manner of managing it, that the South Sea fashion of wearing such ornaments in the nose has never come into this country. Some men cultivate neat ebony canes with golden heads, which, they tell you, cost a guinea. Some cultivate a lisp. A few, who fall under the denomination of stout gentlemen, rejoice in a respectable swell of the haunch, with three wrinkles of the coat lying upon it in majestic repose. Some cultivate a neckcloth—some a shirt breast—some a jewelled pin, with a lesser pin at a little distance, which serves to it as a kind of anchor. There has also of late been a great fashion of cultivating chains about the waistcoat. Some only shew about two inches of a gold or silver one between the buttons and the pocket; others, less modest, have themselves almost laced round and round with this kind of tracery. There is also to be detected, occasionally, a small patch of cultivation in the shape of a curious watch-key or seal, which depends from part of the chain, and is evidently a great pet. A not uncommon subject of cultivation is a gold watch.

In our time, we have known some men whose taste for cultivation descended so low as the very foot: they took a pleasure in a particular jet of the trouser at the bottom, where it joined the shoe. Then there is a class who cultivate silk umbrellas. It is a prevalent idea among many men, that a silk umbrella is an exceedingly genteel thing. They therefore have an article of this kind, which they are always carrying in a neat, careful manner, so as to shew that it is silk. They seem to feel as if they thought all right when they have their silk umbrella in their hand : it is a kind of patent of respectability. With a silk umbrella, they could meet the highest personages in the land, and not be abashed. A silk umbrella is, indeed, a thing of such vast effect, that they would be content to go in humble guise in every other respect, provided they only had this saving-clause to protect them. Nay, it is not too much to suppose them entertaining this belief—that five-and-twenty shillings put forth on a good silk umbrella, produces as much value, in dignity, as L.5 spent upon good broadcloth. How some men do fondle and cultivate silk umbrellas !

There is a species of cultivators who may, in some cases, be very respectable, and entitled to our forbearance, but are, in others, worthy of a little ridicule. I mean the health-seekers ; the men who go out at five in the morning to cultivate an appetite, and regularly chill every sharp-set evening-party they attend, by sitting like Melancholy retired, ostentatiously insisting that they ‘ never take supper.’ When a health-seeker takes a walk, he keeps his coat wide open, his vest half open — seems, in short, to woo the contact of the air—and evidently regrets very much that he cannot enjoy it in the manner of a bath. As he proceeds, he consumes air, as a steam-boat consumes coal ; insomuch that, when he leaves the place, you would actually think the atmosphere has a fatigued and exhausted look, as if the whole oxygen had been absorbed to supply his individual necessities. Wherever this man goes, the wind rises behind him, by reason of the vacuum which he has produced. He puffs, pants, fights, strives, struggles for health. When he returns from his morning-walk, he first looks in the glass, to congratulate himself on the bloom which he has been cultivating in his cheek, and thereafter sits down to solace the appetite which he finds he has nursed into a kind of fury. At any ordinary time, he could spring from his bed at nine o’clock, and devour four cups of tea, with bread, ham, eggs, and haddock beyond reckoning. But he thinks it necessary to walk four hours, for the purpose of enabling himself to take eight cups, and a still more unconscionable proportion of bread, ham, eggs, and haddock. He may be compared, in some measure, to the fat oxen which are sometimes shewn about as wonders, though apparently there is nothing less wonderful, the obvious natural means being taken. These oxen, if left to themselves in a good park, would become very respectable oxen—a little embonpoint, perhaps, but no more. But, being treated otherwise, they are rendered unnecessarily fat and unwieldy; and so it is with the appetite of the health-cultivator.

CULTIVATIONS, it will thus be observed, is a subject of vast extent, and of great importance, not only to the landed interest, but to all the other interests of the country. I should be glad to treat it at full length in a separate volume, for which, I doubt not, ample materials might be found. But I must content myself with giving it in the meantime only a kind of topping, as the farmers say; and perhaps I may return to it next harvest. R. C.

THE PRIZE GERANIUM:

A SKETCH OF VILLAGE LIFE.

THERE is no part of England I have ever seen more interesting to me than Salisbury Plain. Unlike the usual idea of English scenery, it is adorned by no green meadows, no scented hay-fields, no shady hedgerows. Not very long ago—I should suppose within the memory of many living—it was mostly uncultivated, and served as pasture-ground for sheep; the greater part of it is now, however, under tillage; and in the early autumn, when I visited it, was covered, I had almost said, with seas of waving grain. And somewhat similar was the effect produced on my mind by this plain to that produced by the sea. When in the midst of those unenclosed downs, the view is only bounded by the horizon, save in one direction, where some low rising-ground—anywhere else unworthy the name of hills—scarce interferes with the ocean-like sense of the rest; as in the dim remoteness this low line of coast-like form, might not inaptly represent the cliffs of a distant shore. This rising-ground, like the plain itself, is formed of chalk; and in the turf, or other vegetation with which it is covered, is cut out on the white background the figure of a horse—the ancient Saxon emblem.

Instead of sails on this solid and waveless sea, one may occasionally discern some wagon, coach, or carriage, standing out against the sky, as it wends its way across the downs; or here and there long poles, or similar landmarks, to point out the road in snow, might typify masts; while last, not least, rising out of a kind of yet unploughed, half-moorish, half pasture-land, may be seen, like rocks rising from the deep, a stupendous temple of stone, hoary with the age of many centuries, older than the legendary days of the early Saxon invaders, more ancient far than history itself. This is Stonehenge, probably the most ancient remnant of antiquity in Britain—certainly one of the most interesting archaeological problems in the world. And those low barrows by which it is surrounded possess, too, a similar mysterious interest. Are they, too, parts of some great astronomical and religious scheme or map, of which Salisbury Plain was the fitting field?—or are they the resting-places of the mighty dead, whose names perished, perchance, thousands of years ago, whose very existence now is but a doubt?

It may sound strange to speak of the valleys in a plain; but, though strange, it is true. Fancy a raised flat surface, with various irregular cracks or fissures in it—but these bearing no greater proportion to the magnitude of the surface than cracks in a china plate do to the size of that article of domestic convenience—and you have some idea of the relative proportions of these downs and the valleys by which they are intersected. Those valleys are oases of verdure, clothed with old trees and green meadows, and watered by pleasant streams, the chief of which is the little river Avon. Many of the prettiest little villages in all England are sprinkled thickly on the sedgy, rushy banks of the still, calm Avon, each with its squire's mansion at one end, and sometimes in a park-like enclosure, its grave, cheerful parsonage, and solemn little church, with its ancient tower and venerable yews. There are not, in all the length and breadth of our land, any communities, except it may be in the Hebrides or Shetland, more thoroughly 'out of the world,' as the phrase is, than these little Wiltshire villages. The railways, which have done so much to bring many remote places within the pale of the bustling world's life, have tended to shut them out from it. Since their establishment, the stately mail and stage coaches which used to traverse the plain, have ceased to run. There is no thoroughfare now through its quiet green vales. It is an island of rest and silence in the midst of an ocean of noise and bustle. Yet human life, its hopes, fears, wishings, strivings, are there the same as all the world over.

It was the latter end of July when I arrived at the little village of —, that sweetest season when the brilliant gorgeousness of summer begins to merge into the more sober glory of autumn. The great waving fields of grain on the downs were whitening to harvest. The tangling vetch, and the scarlet poppy, and the blue cornflower, and many other sweet blossoms, grew in the fields or by the wayside ; while the low, reedy banks of the Avon were fragrant with meadow-sweet, and beautiful with the delicate white flowers and trailing shoots of that most graceful of all wild plants, the convolvulus. The roses and the lilies in the rectory flower-garden had given place to geraniums, verbenas, carnations, and sweet-peas. Brilliantly they glowed in their pretty beds on the smoothest and greenest little lawn in all England ; and quietly rose the old church-tower above the little shrubbery which alone separated the flower-garden from the village graveyard. The rectory-house itself was a most pleasant dwelling, irregular in shape, and built of shining flint, bordered with brick, and was light and bright and airy ; the gayness, however, sobered by a certain air of seriousness, even as the cheerful spirits of its hospitable inhabitants were mellowed by an ever-present sense of the holy and honourable work they were there to perform.

When I arrived at —, I found all the village occupied in looking forward to and preparing for a horticultural show, in which prizes were to be distributed to the most successful cultivators of village-gardens. It was to be held the week after my arrival, in an immense barn about a stone's throw from the rectory. I had just come from London, and the Great Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations seemed to have created there hardly so intense an interest as this village vegetable-exhibition in sweet little —. Oh ! would it be a fine day ? The weather was very unsettled : when there were no black thunder-clouds and pelting showers, there was a mackerel sky and mares' tails. But the rectory gardener, who was the presiding genius of the whole affair, and to whom it was the greatest day by far of the whole year, was certain the weather would clear before then. 'It was sure to be a fine day : ' so said we all, but I at least had a misgiving in my heart.

One evening, a few days before the all-important one of the fête, I accompanied my friend and hostess on one of her visits of kindness to a sick neighbour. The cottage in which the latter dwelt consisted of only one apartment, but this one was large and airy. In a recess formed by the fireplace, which was built out towards the middle of the floor, stood the bed, which was shaded by clean chintz curtains. The scanty furniture of the apartment was also clean and comfortable, and in the window was a handsome, vigorous geranium, on which some flowers were already blown, while others were on the point of unfolding. But my attention was attracted chiefly by a deformed girl, who sat at a small deal-table opposite the fire, busily engaged in needlework. She was dreadfully deformed. Her shoulders were almost as high as her head, and she had on her back an undeniable hump. She was very short, her features harsh, and her complexion pale, though not sickly. But the expression of this face, to a physiognomist like myself, almost atoned for its want of physical beauty. It was lively, ardent, and hopeful ; and the quick dark eye, which would have been a fine one had it not been rather too deep set, was full of intelligence, and seemed to me to denote practical ability of no ordinary degree. Altogether, I was impressed with the idea of a cheerful, kindly, healthy spirit—a spirit so much occupied in thinking of things without, that it had no time to make itself miserable by dwelling on the deficiencies of the tabernacle in which it dwelt. ‘Ah !’ I said to myself, as I inspected the finished execution of a shirt with which the girl was busy—for I consider myself a tolerable judge of needlework—‘so much for having something to do—a work in the world, however humble : another confirmation of my favourite doctrine—that, humanly speaking, hope and employment are the two great requisites for happiness.’ I had put a few questions to the young work-woman, and she had answered, as I expected, in an intelligent, respectful, and gratified manner, when I was called to the side of the bed by my friend to speak to the invalid.

A striking contrast was she in every respect to Rhoda, for such was the name of the little seamstress—a common one in that part of the world. The sick girl did not seem much above twenty. Her figure, as far as one could judge, as she now sat propped up by pillows, was straight and well formed. Her features were remarkably fine ; but, alas ! her complexion had all the exquisite and unmistakable clearness of consumption, and its beautiful but unearthly light blazed in her large brown eyes. She spoke cheerfully, but seemed quite aware that the inevitable hour drew nigh.

We lingered but a few seconds by her bedside, and then, fearful of exhausting her, we turned to leave the cottage. As we passed the table where Rhoda sat, I stopped for a minute to bestow the praise on her needlework I had been prevented giving before by the call of my friend.

'Yes,' said my friend, 'Rhoda is the best needlewoman in the parish, and the best worker, and so useful in the school.'

'And the best nurse,' said the feeble voice of the sick girl from the bed.

'I do not know what the parish would do without Rhoda,' rejoined my friend.

The deformed girl looked up from her work. Her lip quivered, her dark features flushed with pleasure, and a tear started to her expressive eyes.

'It is little I can do for you or Mary, ma'am,' she said, 'when I think of what you have done for me.'

She spoke in so low a tone that it was impossible her voice could reach the invalid, and we passed out of the cottage.

'There is some history attaches to these two girls,' I said to my companion as we returned to the rectory.

'One can hardly call it a history,' was her reply; 'it is but an anecdote illustrating how much good may be done by a little kindness. If you will take a few turns on the lawn, I shall be happy to tell you all there is to tell. The air will do me good, too, as the sight of poor Mary has made me sad.'

Accordingly, we repaired to the lawn; and as the shades of the balmy summer evening crept over the old church and the pleasant flower-garden, my friend communicated to me the following account of the two girls, whose appearance, for reasons so different, had interested me so much. I prefer, however, giving the substance of the narrative in my own words, as I shall thereby be enabled to make it more concise.

When my hospitable friends came to the parish a few years back, as far as I could gather, for they were no trumpeters of their own good deeds, they found it in a very neglected state. There were but few of the orderly cottages, and none of the neat, smiling, productive little gardens which make it now the beau-ideal of a rural village. Need I say that the moral condition of the village was also different. Are not neat cottages and trim gardens somewhat of a moral index? Is not the progress of industry at once the cause and the consequence of a higher moral tone?

On looking round on their new flock, even amid much that was disorderly and degraded looking, morally and physically—they were more especially struck by a poor deformed girl. She was dressed in rags. Her hair, matted and disorderly, was stuffed behind her ears, and hung down her back. Her plain, harsh features were not devoid of a certain sharp, but not pleasant kind of intelligence. She looked at once depressed, discontented, and rebellious, and shot round fierce and angry glances at the children, who seemed to jeer and laugh at her.

‘Who is that girl?’ inquired the new pastor of a young woman who chanced to be passing by.

‘Only Humpy Rhoda!’ she answered contemptuously, while a smile of self-complacency, as she glanced after the poor deformed girl, played round her rosy lips, and brightened her large hazel eyes. This was Mary, then in the first blush of womanhood—tall, straight, and slender, and radiant with the freshest bloom of youth and health.

It chanced that Rhoda heard the answer. She turned round, saying, with an expression of the bitterest rage and mortification: ‘I hate you, Mary—I hate every one of you!’ and then burst into tears. Here was a frightful state of feeling on both sides—a state of absolute moral darkness!

But it was necessary to commence a reform cautiously as well as zealously. It was first represented to Mary that Rhoda was as God made her, and that to mock at God’s work, was to mock at Himself. Mary was a soft-hearted, impressible girl, with a naturally amiable disposition. She had merely been led into her present seeming cruelty by thoughtlessness, by the general voice, and by her own beauty and popularity. She was very anxious to please the new rector and his lady. Partly from this motive, partly from a better, and partly from the natural amiability of her disposition, she was easily won over to treat Rhoda with respect and kindness. To induce in Rhoda better feelings was a much more difficult task: not that my friends had much difficulty in gaining her affections. She was taught to read and work, and various other useful arts, and she learned with almost marvellous rapidity—for her abilities were good—her energy was immense, and all her powers were stimulated by the wish to surpass those who had despised her. And she did surpass them. She was the most cleanly, active, and industrious girl in the village. There was nothing within the ordinary compass of village affairs that Rhoda could not accomplish. What was too difficult for another, was easy to the clever Rhoda. All this produced its natural effect upon the strong feelings and undisciplined mind of the deformed girl. She became passionately devoted to the rector and his lady; but all their persuasions were unavailing to induce her to forgive those who had formerly used her unkindly. Her feelings of resentment, and her feelings of gratitude were equally strong. To Mary, more especially, she displayed her unforgiving spirit. Nothing could persuade her that the present gentle conduct of the latter proceeded from any other motive than a desire to supplant her in the favour of the rector and his lady. She ‘hated such meanness, and even to please them—and she would have died for them—she would not stoop to the same. They were good, she knew; but as to Mary, who was as proud as a peacock, pretending to be like them, she was not to be taken in by any such hypocrisy.’ And she would frequently send Mary to my friend with tears in her eyes, and her temper wellnigh lost, saying that it was all in vain to hope to make an impression on Rhoda. But my friend bade her be of good cheer, and that patience and kindness would prevail in the end. ‘You know, Mary,’ she would say, ‘this is but the natural consequence of your former thoughtless conduct. Only by unwearied perseverance can you shew that you have heartily repented of it.’

It was almost immediately after the arrival of my friends at ——, that, for the encouragement of industry, and with the hope of creating a healthy recreation, and repressing unhealthy ones, the horticultural show was established, and the system of prizes introduced. Neither Mary nor Rhoda having gardens, they were of course precluded from competing in the way of vegetables or bouquets. But there was to be a prize also for the best geranium, and for this they both resolved to contend. At last the day arrived. There were various other geraniums besides Mary's and Rhoda's; but by almost every one theirs were thought the best, though which of the two bore off the palm was greatly disputed. But the judges were not chosen from among the villagers. They were selected from among the gardeners of the neighbouring gentlemen, and were ignorant to whom the various articles belonged. Whether right or wrong, I cannot tell, this conclave awarded the prize to Mary.

Nothing could exceed Rhoda's jealousy and mortification. She was very ambitious of distinction, and had set her heart as anxiously on the geranium prize as ever did statesman on power, or general on conquest, or author on fame, or any other human being on any earthly bauble whatever. Small and insignificant as her ambition may seem to us, little was the world to Rhoda; and perhaps, after all, what we call great and small may be to a different order of beings but the difference between one microscopic atom and another. Be that as it may, Rhoda, like most persons of strong feelings under a violent disappointment, who have received no moral education, got into a passion, and exclaimed there had not been fair play, and that the prize had been given, not to the best geranium, but to Mary's pretty face. At this, there was a great outcry of 'Shame!' among the assembled competitors, with all of whom the pretty and good-tempered Mary was a great favourite. Glances of reproach and contempt were cast upon Rhoda, and expressions of sympathy with Mary were heard on every side. Maddened with disappointment, and the old bitter sense of hardship and ill-usage returning upon her, Rhoda, in a sort of transport, pushed recklessly past Mary in the crowd. In doing so, she knocked the latter against the projecting part of a wall. Mary lost her balance, and trying to recover it—both her hands occupied in carrying the flower-pot which held the geranium—her foot struck against a stone, and she fell. She was instantly lifted up, her face as pale as that of the dead, and covered with blood. She had fainted. She was laid by the bystanders on some turf close at hand, and in a few seconds she recovered her senses. Meantime Rhoda, in a new passion of remorse and penitence, had thrown herself down beside her. ‘Take her away, the wicked thing—she has done it !’ cried some among the crowd who had gathered round. But Mary raising herself, said : ‘No, no ; let her stay. You are sorry, Rhoda—are you not ? You were only a little bit angry just at the time, you know.’ Now, Mary at first had been somewhat incensed against Rhoda, but her fall, instead of further irritating her, had calmed her at once. It is a remarkable truth, that a little provocation will sometimes make us angry, when a real injury makes us magnanimous, perhaps because the latter calls out our deeper principles and feelings, while the former acts only upon our superficial impulses.

A medical gentleman, who had been present as one of the spectators, now arrived from the rectory. Mary complained much of having hurt her arm, and on examining it, he pronounced it to be broken. Rhoda’s terror and distress were now extreme ; but even in the midst of them, she displayed her superior presence of mind and readiness of resource. Mary was carried home, and laid in bed previous to her arm being set. While this operation was being performed, Rhoda held the patient, who had the magnanimity not to utter a complaint.

‘And now, Rhoda,’ said the aunt of Mary, with whom the latter lived, for her own parents were both dead, ‘you may go away—I am glad you seem to be a little sorry.’ The tears started into Rhoda’s dark eyes.

‘No, Rhoda,’ said Mary ; ‘I should like you to stay, if you would ; for I shall not be well for a day or two, and nobody would nurse me I know like you.'

'O Mary, you are really good !' was Rhoda's sole response ; but she stayed ; and never had invalid a more zealous attendant.

Mary's illness was, however, of short duration ; and the fracture being simple, the bone speedily knit together again. But from the day on which Rhoda had acknowledged the formerly hated Mary to be really good, she never wavered from her conviction, and did not seem to be able to do enough to atone for her former unkindness. And Mary's perseverance in well-doing was rewarded at last. But good always produces more good. Rhoda now began to ask herself, if Mary had been 'really good,' what she herself had been ? Her heart had been turned by Mary's goodness. Might not the hearts of others be turned in the same manner ? Some had been unkind to her : she would be kind to them, as Mary had been to her. Whether or not it would have the same effect in their case, she felt at least that it would make herself happier. She now began to perceive the force of much she had heard her good pastor both preach and say, that had hitherto fallen on her ear as mere meaningless words.

She put in practice her good intentions. She worked for, nursed, helped, comforted everybody. At first, people began by doubting her, and by saying she would change ; but at last they were forced to be convinced that she was sincere and constant. A great revulsion in popular feeling was the consequence. Everybody began to see that every one but the rector, his lady, and Mary had been wrong. Rhoda was now a public blessing ; and was it not everybody's own fault that she had not always been so ?

But these pleasant changes had hardly taken place at ——, than an event occurred which saddened all the little community. Mary caught cold one chill spring night, and the cold seized on her lungs. Ere long, it became evident to all—even to Rhoda, who hoped till hope was impossible—that her end was at hand. Such was the substance of my friend's narrative.

The day before the eventful one of the fête was pouring wet—not a break in the clouds, not one gleam of sunshine the whole day. Still, the gardener said: ‘It will be fine to-morrow.’ And it was fine on the morrow. It was one of those bright days one occasionally sees in the midst of unsettled weather, when the sun seems even brighter than usual, when the earth wears her gayest green, and the trees, even in the summer's decline, seem to renew the freshness of spring. Mary was still alive. How busy we were all the early morning decorating the barn with green branches, receiving the contributions of the candidates, and arranging them all on the benches, covered with white cotton for the purpose! I was standing near the door when Rhoda handed in the geranium I had noticed in the window of Mary's cottage. ‘Is this yours, Rhoda?’ I asked.

She looked down as she answered, while the dark eyes filled with tears: ‘No, miss—it is poor Mary's. O miss, I do so hope she may get the prize!’

My friend, who was near me, said as soon as Rhoda was gone: ‘The geranium was Rhoda's, but it has been Mary's ever since her own was destroyed by the fall the day her arm was broken. It is far finer now than it was then, for Mary, till she was confined to bed, spared no pains in tending it, and Rhoda has taken care of it for her since.’

And now all is ready, and the guests are beginning to assemble in the rectory drawing-room; and soon it was full, and then, by half-a-dozen at a time, we go to inspect the exhibition; and then the judges inspect it likewise, and hold their important deliberations; and then we all go in a body to see the prizes distributed. The geranium prize was awarded to Mary. Never shall I forget Rhoda's look of satisfaction. ‘Oh!’ she cried, ‘I did so wish her to get this once more, and she is a little easier to-day.’

‘May I go with you, Rhoda, to tell her?’ I asked.

Permission was granted, and we went. On arriving, we found that the invalid, who had seemed better all the morning, had suddenly sunk into a very low state. Rhoda's countenance fell. 'She won't care for prizes now,' whispered the aunt.

The dying girl heard the whisper, and looked up. 'O yes, I do!' she cried. 'Thank you, my kind Rhoda: I care for any proof of your kindness.' Then, after a pause, and with some difficulty: 'Dear Rhoda! take back the geranium, and keep it in memory of our having forgiven one another. There is nothing so blessed as forgiveness; but I cannot speak now.'

Ready to weep, I was obliged to return to the gay scene, and leave those humble friends, who were truly of earth's noblest. Rhoda I saw no more that day: I guessed how she was occupied.

The guests are now wandering on the lawn: here, a group of clergymen, discussing weighty affairs no doubt; there, a knot of married ladies, discussing affairs also weighty of course; there, one or two squires, coursing their matches o'er again; there, some young persons talking nonsense, as young persons will; and there, a sentimental couple, who have retreated into a moss-house—"to be out of the sun," they say; but I have an inward suspicion, to escape me—I, in my stupidity, or pre-occupation of mind, having been quite unconscious till that moment that I had been one too many. And now, I stand alone by the window, and a neighbouring squire's wife approaches me, politely entering into conversation with the stranger, and saying what a pleasant sight it has been, and how she wishes there was a Mrs — in every parish; and I heartily respond to the wish. And then we go to luncheon; and then the villagers assemble to dinner in the barn; then the guests, small and great, all disperse by degrees. It is all over. The great day of the year at little — has gone off brilliantly. We have tea quietly, and I go up to my own room to rest, and to think of Mary and Rhoda.

My room looks out on the lawn, and on the little church. It is dusk: the gay company are all gone: softly night steals over the scene, so sweet and so still: the stars shine peacefully down on the little church, and its dark, overshadowing trees: the calm is almost preternatural: suddenly, a sound breaks on the silence—a slow, solemn sound from the bell in the church-tower; and I know well what that sound means—I know that the spirit of the gentle Mary has passed away from forgiveness on earth to forgiveness beyond the earth.

I am far away now from that quiet village in the great Wiltshire Plain; but amid the fever of busy life, to think of it is, to my mind, like a soothing anodyne. The memory of the garden-show, with its innocent gaiety, the noble feelings of the two peasant girls, and the end of the whole, so sad yet so touching, spring up in my heart evermore like a fountain shedding around it freshness and repose.

CAVE-TEMPLES IN THE EAST.

AMONGST the remarkable objects which are scattered profusely over the vast continent of Asia, few have more frequently arrested the attention and excited the admiration of the traveller, than those cave-temples which are situated on the islands of Salsette and Elephanta, near Bombay, in the East Indies. They are calculated to astonish not only by their vast size, but also by the singularity of their conformation; for they are not, like other temples, composed of small parts put regularly together, and reared from a foundation upwards, but have been hewn out of the living rock with infinite labour and care. We propose to give an account of these works, drawn up from the writings of various travellers who have visited and described them.

Salsette was formerly separated from Bombay by a strait 200 yards wide, across which, in the year 1805, a causeway was carried, thus uniting it with the larger island. It is 18 miles long, by 14 broad; and the comparatively small area comprised within these limits, is remarkably rich in mythological antiquities, and the remains of reservoirs, with flights of stone-steps round them. But by far the most splendid remains of former grandeur, are the temple-caves of Canara, or Kennery, on account of their number, their beautiful situation, their elaborate carving, and their marked connection with the religion of Buddha. The caves are scattered at different elevations over the sides of a high rocky hill, and literally perforate it like a honeycomb. They differ considerably in form, size, and accommodation; and if we suppose the largest to have been a temple where religious ceremonies were performed, the smaller ones may have been the habitations of the priests and their pupils, when India was the nursing-mother of art and science, ere Europe emerged from ignorance and barbarism. Many have deep and well-carved cisterns attached to them, which, even in dry seasons, are supplied with water. One of the caves, a large and nearly square chamber, covered with magnificent carving, and in the inside surrounded by a broad stone-bench, is called the Durbas, from a supposition that it was appropriated to certain purposes of state during the time that the island was under the Mohammedan domination. The great temple is situated at some distance from the summit of the mountain, in a commanding situation. It was at one time converted into a place of Christian worship by the Portuguese. This stupendous work is entered through a lofty and beautiful portico of the same height and breadth as the temple, having on its front, but inclining to the left hand, a high detached octagonal pillar, surmounted by three lions seated back to back. The whole is very richly decorated. On the east side, there is a colossal statue of Buddha, with his hands raised in the attitude of benediction; and the screen which separates the vestibule from the temple, is covered with a row of male and female figures, nearly in a state of nudity. They are carved with considerable spirit, and the learned Bishop Heber is of opinion that they represent dancers in various attitudes. The outer front of the portico, and the area before it, are now injured by time, and the mouldering sculpture is intermingled with clematis and various rock-plants. In the centre of the portico is a large door, above which is a semi-circular arch containing three windows. The apartment to which this splendid entrance conducts, is an oblong square, terminated by a semicircle opposite the entrance; and in the centre of this semicircle, with a free walk all round it, is a circular mass of rock left solid 19 feet high, and 48 feet in circumference. It is carved externally like a dome, as well as ornamented on the top after the manner of the capital of a column, and from this a large gilt umbrella used formerly to spring. This dome is generally supposed to be a representation of the lingam, the symbol of Seva, or Siva, one of the incarnations of the divine being in the Brahminical mythology. The following are the exact dimensions of the temple itself:—Length of the interior, 91 feet 6 inches; breadth, 38 feet; depth of the portico, 12 feet; portico-wall, or support of rock, 5 feet; front-wall, or support of rock, 3 feet; area 28 feet; outer-wall, or support of rock, 2 feet 8 inches. The length of the whole temple, portico, and area leading to it, is 142 feet 2 inches. A colonnade of octagonal pillars runs down each side and across the bottom of the apartment, leaving a narrow walk between them and the wall. Twelve of these on each side nearest the entrance are ornamented with carved bases and capitals, in the style usual in Indian temples. They are generally finished in a masterly style, and the sculpture is little impaired by time. Some of the pillars are comparatively plain, though none are altogether without ornament. On the summits of several, there is carved a figure resembling a bell, between elephants, horses, lions, and other kinds of animals.

The roof of the temple is arched semicircularly, and ornamented with slender ribs of teak-wood, having the same curve as the roof, and disposed as if they were supporting it; but neither does it require this aid, nor are they strong enough for the purpose. They were doubtless appropriated to some purpose, probably during the celebration of solemn festivities, to suspend lamps or flowers from. The antiquity of this beautiful and majestic temple will be examined after the excavations of Elephanta have been described.

The island of Elephanta, about two leagues from Bombay, is rather more than six miles in circumference, and has the appearance of a long hill divided in two, there being a low narrow valley running between two abrupt eminences which skirt it on either side. About a furlong from the beach, there formerly stood erect the figure of an elephant, thrice the size of life, rudely sculptured out of an enormous mass of dark-coloured rock ; and from this circumstance, the island derived its name, which was given to it by the Portuguese. The hill which contains the excavations is ascended by a narrow path, winding amongst rocks, trees, and underwood ; and about half way up, the first cave opens upon the view. The entrance is by no means so imposing as that of Salsette ; and, from the lowness of the roof, the spectator is constantly reminded of being in a cave or rocky subterranean chamber. Yet his surprise and admiration are excited to the highest degree when he enters ; and all travellers concur in stating, that it is entitled to the whole of the praise which has been lavished upon it. Rows of massive columns cut out of the solid rock, in uniform order, and regularly placed, form three magnificent avenues leading from the top to the bottom. The capitals of each seem to form a cushion, upon which the roof rests ; and so admirably are they cut, that they appear as if they had collapsed by the weight of the superincumbent mass. The apartment is surrounded by handsome colonnades, the pillars of which are carved with uncommon delicacy. The sides are adorned with groups of figures in alto relief, placed at regular distances, and terminating the avenues formed by the colonnades, so that only one group is seen at a time, except on a near approach : the regularity and proportion of the whole are remarkably striking. The figures are generally in graceful attitudes ; but an indication of corresponding muscular strength is awanting in those of gigantic size.

In a recess at the bottom, facing the vestibule, and nearly in the centre, is an enormous bust having three faces, each five feet in length, the whole being six yards in height. This is generally supposed to represent the deity in the Hindoo mythology—Brahma, Vishnoo, and Siva—in the characters of the creator, preserver, and destroyer. The face in the middle displays regular features, and a placid serenity of character. It is adorned with a towering head-dress, on each side of which is a profusion of ornaments. The aspect of Vishnoo has the same mild character as that of Brahma ; but in the countenance of Siva, severity and revenge, the characteristics of his destroying nature, are strongly depicted. In one of the hands is a large snake, while the others contain fruits, flowers, and other blessings for mankind ; the lotos and pomegranate being easily distinguished. The lotos, which is so often introduced into the Hindoo mythology, forms a principal object in the sculpture and paintings in their temples, is the ornament of their sacred lakes, and the most conspicuous beauty in their flowery sacrifices. This gem of Flora's crown is frequently seen in the Egyptian and Grecian sculpture. Some recent writers, and amongst the rest Bishop Heber, have questioned the opinion of this statue being a representation of the Hindoo deity, and for it have substituted the theory, that it is the threefold face of Siva. This conjecture was advanced by the learned prelate in support of his somewhat lame hypothesis, that these temples are of comparatively recent origin ; because Siva alone, in his threefold aspect, is, and has been for centuries, the popular deity of the Hindoos. But we shall recur to this subject afterwards.

On each side of this colossal statue is a gigantic figure leaning on a dwarf—an object of frequent occurrence in the sculptures of these excavations. The giants seem to stand as a body-guard to the grand idol, and separate it from a large recess filled with a variety of figures of both sexes in different attitudes. There is one conspicuous female figure, single-breasted, like the Amazons; the rest, whether they represent mortals or immortals, are commonly arrayed in the ornaments worn by the modern Hindoos. The spaces between the larger figures are occupied by small aerial beings, which hover about them in infinite variety. In a recess of this temple, there is one piece of sculpture, executed with remarkable beauty and spirit. It is a colossal statue, fourteen feet high, and represents the Siva Vindex of the Hindoo pantheon. It is much mutilated, the whole of the lower extremities having been broken away; and of the eight arms with which it was originally provided, several are now broken. Enough, however, of this gigantic personage remains to convey an idea of the sculpture, which is very fine. The countenance expresses terrible ferocity, blended with a certain degree of majesty, which serves to convey the idea, that, though the wrath there bodied forth be unrelenting, it is that of a deity, not the vulgar and brutal passion of a mortal. There are many other figures, some of equal size, and some less; and all, whether single or in groups, have a reference to the mythology of the Brahmins, whilst the caverns of Canara or Kennery are unequivocally Buddhist temples. ‘This temple,’ says Mr Moore, in his Hindoo Pantheon, ‘may be called a complete pantheon; for among the hundreds, I may say thousands, of figures there sculptured, every principal deity is found. Many deified heroes in the more modern mythological romances, contained in some of the Puranas and Tantras, will have been exalted since the excavation of this wonderful cavern; but I strongly believe that all the gods of the Vedas (sacred writings of the Hindoos), or, if I may so term them, all the legitimate Hindoo deities, will be found in its different compartments, if not indeed too much defaced for recognition.’

On the right and left, passages lead off to smaller excavations, containing sculptures, baths, &c.; and in one of the apartments is a colossal representation of the

lingam. With regard to the impression made upon the mind of a spectator on visiting these caves, the words of Bishop Heber, a man of refined tastes and elegant accomplishments, may be quoted:—‘Though my expectations were highly raised,’ says that learned dignitary, ‘the reality much exceeded them, and that both the dimensions, the proportions, and the sculpture, seemed to me to be of a more noble character, and a more elegant execution, than I had been led to suppose. Even the statues are executed with great spirit, and are, some of them, of no common beauty, considering their dilapidated condition, and the coarseness of their material.’ Another writer observes, regarding these extraordinary works of human skill and perseverance:—‘The Elephanta caves, especially, cause admiration, when we contemplate the immensity of the undertaking, the number of artificers employed, and the extraordinary genius of its first projector, in a country until lately accounted rude and barbarous by the now enlightened nations of Europe. It is a work which would be admired by the curious, had it been raised from a foundation like other structures; but when we consider that it is hewn inch by inch in the hard and solid rock, we cannot but be astonished at the conception and completion of the undertaking.’

Writers are not at all agreed upon the antiquity of these excavations, and, in the absence of anything like positive proof, a degree of uncertainty must attach to all conjectures regarding the period at which they were executed. Bishop Heber is opposed to the more generally received opinion of their high antiquity, and urges in support of his views, amongst other arguments, the following:—That the rock out of which the temple is carved, is by no means calculated to resist, for any great length of time, the influence of the elements; and that decomposition has rapidly increased within the memory of man; but this is evidently an erroneous view of the matter, for if the mouldering is so rapid as to be perceptible by persons now living, the whole structure would have been one heap of ruins long before the lapse of half the number of ages which the learned prelate admits it most probably to have existed.

There can be little doubt but these caves were appropriated to religious purposes (the pure Hindoo religion and mythology it seems almost certain); and as they are the most magnificent to be found in the country, we are entitled to trace their origin to that period of Hindoo history when that people had arrived at their highest pitch of prosperity, and their religious ceremonies were conducted on the most splendid scale, and in the most magnificent edifices. We are by no means to suppose that, in the decline of national prosperity, and consequently of religious observances, such a Herculean labour as the execution of Elephanta would have been undertaken; nor is it likely, on the other hand, that it was elaborated from the solid rock, before the national prosperity had reached at least a very high degree of perfection, else we might look for still more remarkable instances of their industry, taste, and religious zeal, which, however, are not to be found. But all authentic records of the ancient history of this part of India have perished, and the poems and histories which at present exist, and generally relate the occurrences of remote antiquity, are a tissue of incredible fables. This, the only other means of determining the question, being denied us, plausible conjecture alone can be advanced; and it is, that these works were executed between three and four thousand years ago.

MR BIANCONI'S CARS.

Few men have been so useful in their day as Mr Bianconi of Clonmel. This gentleman, whose successful enterprise affords an apt instance of what may be accomplished by well-directed perseverance, is a native of Milan, and from being one of the poorest, is now one of the wealthiest men in Ireland. Having come to Ireland about thirty years ago, in some humble mercantile capacity, he quickly perceived the advantages, public and private, which might be gained by establishing stage-cars on various roads throughout that country, and began by attempting to run one from Clonmel to Cahir. The experiment was at first discouraging, few or no passengers supporting it; but the plan ultimately triumphed, beyond the most sanguine expectations which could have been formed of such an undertaking.

At the meeting of the British Association at Cork, Statistical Section, Mr Bianconi was called on to read a paper on the subject of his establishment, which he did as follows:—

'Up to the year 1815, the public accommodation for the conveyance of passengers in Ireland was confined to a few mail and day coaches on the great lines of road. From my peculiar position in the country, I had ample opportunities of reflecting on many things, and nothing struck me more forcibly than the great vacuum that existed in travelling accommodation between the different orders of society. The inconvenience felt for the want of a more extended means of intercourse, particularly from the interior of the country to the different market-towns, gave great advantage to a few at the expense of the many, and, above all, occasioned a great loss of time; for instance, a farmer living twenty or thirty miles from his market-town, spent the day in riding to it, a second day doing his business, and a third day returning. In July 1815, I started a car for the conveyance of passengers from Clonmel to Cahir, which I subsequently extended to Tipperary and Limerick. At the end of the same year, I started similar cars from Clonmel to Cashel and Thurles, and from Clonmel to Carrick and Waterford; and I have since extended this establishment so as to include the most isolated localities—namely, from Longford to Ballina and Bellmullet, which is 201 miles north-west of Dublin; from Athlone to Galway and Clifden, 183 miles due west of Dublin; from Limerick to Tralee and Cahirciveen, 233 miles south-west of Dublin; and numbering 110 vehicles, including mail-coaches and different sized cars capable of carrying from four to twenty passengers each, and travelling eight to nine miles per hour, at an average fare of one penny farthing per mile for each passenger, and performing daily 3800 miles, passing through more than 140 stations for the change of horses; consuming 3000 to 4000 tons of hay, and from 30,000 to 40,000 barrels of oats annually; all of which are purchased in their respective localities. These vehicles do not travel on Sundays, unless such portions of them as are in connection with the post-office or canals, for the following reasons:—First, the Irish, being a religious people, will not travel on business on Sundays; and secondly, experience teaches me, that I can work a horse eight miles per day, for six days in the week, much better than I can six miles for seven days. The advantages derived by the country from this establishment are almost incalculable: for instance, the farmer who formerly rode and spent three days in making his market, can now do so in one, for a few shillings; thereby saving two clear days, and the expense and use of his horse. The example of this institution has been generally followed; and cars innumerable leave the interior for the principal towns in the south of Ireland, which bring parties to and from markets at an enormous saving of time, and, in many instances, cheaper than they could walk it. This establishment has now been in existence twenty-eight years, travelling with its mails at all hours of the day and night, and never met any interruption in the performance of its arduous duties. Much surprise has often been expressed at the high order of men connected with it, and at its popularity; but parties thus expressing themselves forget to look at Irish society with sufficient grasp. For my part, I cannot better compare it than to a man emerging into convalescence from a serious attack of malignant fever, and requiring generous and nutritive diet in place of medical treatment. Thus I act with my drivers, who are taken from the lowest grade of the establishment, and who are progressively advanced according to their respective merits, as opportunity offers, and who know that nothing can deprive them of this reward, and a superannuated allowance of their full wages in old age and under accident, unless their wilful and improper conduct; and as to its popularity, I never yet attempted to do an act of generosity or common justice, publicly or privately, that I was not repaid tenfold. In conclusion, Mr Bianconi regretted that the shortness of the notice which he had received to meet the Association, should have rendered it impossible for him to prepare a document more ample in details and more worthy of the Section.'

Mr and Mrs Hall, in their work, a Week at Killarney, speak in warm terms of approbation of Mr Bianconi's cars. 'In form, they resemble the common outside jaunting-car, but are calculated to hold twelve, fourteen, or sixteen persons; they are well-horsed, have cautious and experienced drivers, are generally driven with three horses, and usually travel at the rate of seven Irish miles an hour; the fares for each person averaging about two-pence per mile. They are open cars, but a huge apron of leather affords considerable protection against rain; and they may be described as, in all respects, very comfortable and convenient vehicles. It would be difficult for a stranger to conceive the immense influence which this establishment has had upon the character and condition of the country: its introduction, indeed, has been only second to that of steam in promoting the improvement of Ireland, by facilitating intercourse between remote districts, and enabling the farmer to transact his own business at a small expense, and with little sacrifice of time.'

Is it possible to read these particulars without a reflection on the advantages to be derived from perseverance in properly designed enterprise? Here is an unfriended foreigner, who, by the mere force of his own ingenuity and industry, directed to practical objects, realises vast public benefits, not to speak of a justly earned private fortune; while others, spending the energy of a life-time on visionary abstractions, accomplish not only no public good, but an incalculable amount of evil, and, as might have been anticipated, leave off poorer than they began.

LOGAN, THE INDIAN CHIEF.

ONE of the most remarkable chiefs of North American Indians, was the celebrated Logan, a Cayuga, the acknowledged head of the Six-Nations, who flourished in the decade 1770-80. In a work on Indian biography, published a number of years ago at New York, there is an account of this individual, and the fate to which he was exposed by the encroaching policy of the whites.

According to the narrative in question, Logan, though belonging to an eastern tribe, resided during most of his life in a western settlement, either at Sandusky, or upon a branch of the Scioto, there being at the former location, a few years before the revolution, about 300 warriors, and about sixty at the latter.

Logan was the second son of Shikellimus, a respectable chief of the Six-Nations, who resided at Shamokin (Pennsylvania), as an agent, to transact business between them and the government of the state. Logan's father was a shrewd and sober man, not addicted to drinking, like most of his countrymen. Indeed, he built his house on pillars, for security against the drunken Indians, and used to ensconce himself within it on all occasions of riot and outrage. He died in 1749, attended in his last moments by a good Moravian bishop.

Logan inherited the talents of his father, but not his prosperity. Nor was this altogether his own fault. He took no part except that of peace-making in the French and English war of 1760, and was ever before and afterwards looked upon as emphatically the friend of the white man. But never was kindness rewarded like his.

In the spring of 1774, a robbery and murder occurred in some of the white settlements on the Ohio, which were charged to the Indians, though perhaps not justly; for it is well known that a large number of civilised adventurers were traversing the frontiers at this time, who sometimes disguised themselves as Indians, and who thought little more of killing one of that people than of shooting a buffalo. A party of these men, land-jobbers and others, undertook to punish the outrage in this case, according to their custom, as Mr Jefferson expresses it, in a summary way.

Colonel Cresap, a man infamous for the many murders he had committed on those much-injured people, collected a party, and proceeded down the Kanawha in quest of vengeance. Unfortunately, a canoe of women and children, with one man only, was seen coming from the opposite shore, unarmed, and not at all suspecting an attack from the whites. Cresap and his party concealed themselves on the bank of the river, and the moment the canoe reached the shore, singled out their objects, and, at one fire, killed every person in it. This happened to be the family of Logan.

It was not long after this that another massacre took place, under still mere aggravated circumstances, not far from the present site of Wheeling, Virginia—a considerable party of the Indians being decoyed by the whites, and all murdered, with the exception of a little girl. Among these, too, was both a brother of Logan and a sister, and the delicate situation of the latter increased a thousandfold both the barbarity of the crime, and the rage of the survivors of the family.

The vengeance of the chieftain was indeed provoked beyond endurance, and he accordingly distinguished himself by his daring and bloody exploits in the war which now ensued, between the Virginians on the one side, and a combination mainly of Shawanees, Mingoos, and Delawares, on the other. The former of these tribes were particularly exasperated by the unprovoked murder of one of their favourite chiefs, SILVER-HEELS, who had, in the kindest manner, undertaken to escort several white traders across the woods from the Ohio to Albany, a distance of nearly 200 miles.

The civilised party prevailed, as usual. A decisive battle was fought upon the 10th of October, of the year last named, on Point Pleasant, at the mouth of the Great Kanawha, in West Virginia, between the confederates, commanded by Logan, and 1000 Virginian riflemen, constituting the left wing of an army led by Governor Dunmore against the Indians of the north-west. This engagement has by some annalists—who, however, have rarely given the particulars of it—been called the most obstinate ever contested with the natives.

The Virginians lost in this action two of their colonels, four captains, many subordinate officers, and about fifty privates killed, besides a much larger number wounded. The governor himself was not engaged in the battle, being at the head of the right wing of the same army—a force of 1500 men, who were at this time on their expedition against the towns of some of the hostile tribes in the north-west.

It was at the treaty ensuing upon this battle, that the following speech was delivered, sufficient to render the name of Logan famous for many a century. It came by the hand of a messenger, sent (as Mr Jefferson states) that the sincerity of the negotiation might not be distrusted on account of the absence of so distinguished a warrior as himself.

‘I appeal to any white man to say, if he ever entered Logan’s cabin hungry, and he gave him not meat; if he ever came cold and naked, and he clothed him not. During the course of the last long and bloody war, Logan remained idle in his cabin, an advocate for peace. Such was my love for the whites, that my countrymen pointed as they passed, and said: “Logan is the friend of white men.” I had even thought to have lived with you, but for the injuries of one man. Colonel Cresap, the last spring, in cold blood, and unprovoked, murdered all the relations of Logan, not sparing even my women and children. There runs not a drop of my blood in the veins of any living creature. This called on me for revenge. I have sought it: I have killed many: I have fully glutted my vengeance. For my country, I rejoice at the beams of peace. But do not harbour a thought that mine is the joy of fear. Logan never felt fear. He will not turn on his heel to save his life. Who is there to mourn for Logan? Not one!

Of this powerful address, Mr Jefferson says: 'I may challenge the whole orations of Demosthenes and Cicero, and of any more eminent orator, if Europe has furnished more eminent, to produce a single passage superior to the speech of Logan;' and an American statesman and scholar, scarcely less illustrious than the author of this noble eulogium, has expressed his readiness to subscribe to it. It is of course unnecessary for any humbler authority to enlarge upon its merits: indeed, they require no exposition—they strike home to the soul.

The melancholy history of Logan must be dismissed with no relief to its gloomy colours. He was himself a victim to the same ferocious cruelty which had already rendered him a desolate man. Not long after the treaty, a party of whites murdered him as he was returning from Detroit to his own country. It grieves us to add, that towards the close of his life, misery had made him intemperate. No security and no solace to Logan was the orator's genius or the warrior's glory. Such was the melancholy fate of Logan. 'The fire-water' of the white trader claimed him as a victim. He sank into an ignominious grave!

STORY OF A BLIND LADY.

LUCY DE MARNE was born towards the end of 1802, in a country town in the north of England. M. de Marne, her father, was a French gentleman, who, during the peace of Amiens, had gone over to England on business, and had married the only daughter of a widow, in whose house he lodged, in the neighbourhood of Newcastle. His wife, who was of a very delicate constitution, died three months afterwards, bearing him a daughter. The child was attacked by ophthalmia in the first month of her age, and lost her sight. When the war broke out anew, M. de Marne returned to France. Little Lucy was scarcely a year old when she inherited a considerable property in the East Indies, coming from an uncle of her mother, an old officer in the navy, who had made a large fortune in the service of the Mahratta princes, and had left it to his niece. So, by a strange caprice of fate, still in her cradle, and afflicted with a deplorable infirmity, little Lucy happened to become a rich heiress.

Judging that the climate of the south would best suit his daughter, who was very delicate, M. de Marne purchased the Château de Sens, in the south-west of France, and settled there, taking with him only two servants, Beraud, and Martha his wife, on whose faithfulness he could depend. Having thus fixed his residence in a pleasant part of France, the father of Lucy proceeded to rear and educate his unfortunate daughter with the greatest possible tenderness. As she grew in years and strength, the best masters competent to teach the blind were procured for her; and under these auspices, she acquired a surprising degree of knowledge of the external world, while as regards the development of moral sentiments, she left nothing to be wished. Acute, intelligent, and kind-hearted, Lucy was universally esteemed and loved. She learned to read by means of raised letters; and also by an ingenious device, she acquired the art of writing. In music, she became a proficient; and so delicate were her hearing sensations, that she could tell the name of every person by the sound of their footstep, or even their breathing. Sitting on a terrace which commanded a view of the Pyrenees, she could, by mere contact with the air, describe the approach of storms, and indicate the direction they would take.

We do not purpose to dwell on the early years of this interesting creature. What has to be told refers to circumstances in her after-life — our object being to recount certain actual occurrences in French domestic history.

In consequence of failing health, M. de Marne found it desirable to resort to a watering-place, in a mountainous district of country. Here he and his daughter became accidentally acquainted with a young gentleman, Henry Lisson, who was pursuing his studies as an artist. Born of an honourable but not wealthy family, Henry had devoted himself to the arts of painting and statuary. He was just about setting out the very next day to visit the lakes in the duchy of Milan, famous for their romantic beauty.

M. de Marne invited the young artist to come and visit him at the Château de Sens when he returned. The young man accepted the invitation for the following spring. On taking leave, he pressed affectionately the old man's hand, and begged to be allowed also to shake hands with Lucy. The young girl was moved; something inexplicable seemed to have befallen her. The pressure of that hand, which had met hers for a moment, seemed always to remain there, and to give her an unknown kind of agitation. ‘What I feel!’ thought she to herself with terror. ‘Can it be the beginning of that terrible passion, of which I have heard tell, and which for me could only be a source of suffering?’

In the meanwhile, the amelioration which had appeared in the health of M. de Marne proved merely temporary. Soon the symptoms became aggravated to such a degree, as to give fears of imminent danger. One evening, feeling much worse, he sent for Beraud, and taking the hand of the distressed old servant, he said to him, not without effort : ‘ My good old friend, you have given me many a proof of your attachment, and now I ask another after my death. Never separate from my poor Lucy, whom I leave alone, in a state of infirmity which exposes her to many dangers. I have written to my sister, and I suppose that she will soon be here. I could not avoid this : never mind, it is to you, and to your wife, who have taken care of and loved my child from her birth, as if she were your own daughter, that I confide her. Promise me that you will never leave her, and I shall die in peace.’ Beraud made the required promise fervently. The next day, M. de Marne was no more.

How paint Lucy’s despair ?—how express the torn heart of her who had lost the being in whom centered all her affections here below ? That her reason did not give way under the trial, was owing partly to the kind care of an excellent English lady, with whom she had become intimate at Pau ; to the affection of Marie, a young girl, whom she had partly educated ; and, above all, to the consoling influence of enlightened religion.

At last, Lucy’s aunt arrived. Her father had rarely spoken to her of this relation, a half-sister, with whom he seldom had any communication. She was a woman between forty and forty-five. Lucy was painfully impressed at the first moment, by finding no likeness at all between the voice of her aunt and that of her father ; and the great flow of sensibility with which she embraced her niece, did not appear to the latter to come from the heart, but to be, on the contrary, rather studied. In a word, she felt towards this aunt an instinctive repugnance, which the sequel only too well justified.

Returning to Sens, all soon resumed its wonted order at the château, where, besides her aunt, Lucy had the company of a dear friend, Adrienne, a young lady of her own age, who came on a visit. Beraud and his wife continued to act as stewards, and took the habit of carrying their accounts to Lucy, as they used to do to her father. When she came to acquire a detailed knowledge of all her possessions, the poor girl felt almost terrified; and she asked herself, what use it could be to her to be so rich, and what she could do with all this wealth.

So slipped away part of the winter. Clorinda—such was the name of Lucy's aunt—had very comfortably taken up her home at the Château de Sens. There was in her manners a certain cheerful good-humour, which made her invitations generally acceptable, and dazzled the good country neighbours. Lucy tried hard over and over again to love this relation, who made so many friends, but she felt it to be impossible, and Adrienne partook entirely of her impressions in this respect.

There happened at that moment to be much public talk about the arrival at Toulouse of a famous Italian singer, who was to give some concerts. Urged by Clorinda, Lucy consented to go, and pass some weeks in that town, and Adrienne accompanied them. The very evening of their arrival, the ladies went to the theatre: the singer fully justified his reputation, so our fair friends did not miss one concert. One evening Lucy, who always chose a place in the background, heard a few words uttered in the next box, and instantly recognised that voice, which had never ceased vibrating in her innermost soul: it was he! A few minutes later, Adrienne laughingly whispered to her friend: 'Lucy, you have certainly captivated a handsome gentleman seated in the next box, for he does not take his eyes off you.' The emotion of the poor blind girl may be easily imagined. She felt disposed to faint, but was suddenly roused by a sort of universal agitation, which broke out through the whole audience. A strong smell of fire, and a good deal of smoke filled the house, and cries of 'Fire! fire!' were heard. Lucy's aunt darted out of the box, and Adrienne fainted. What on earth was to be done? What was to become of them? Lucy turned towards the box where had been heard Henry Lisson's voice, and named him. In one moment he was by her side, told her to depend upon him, took the fainting Adrienne in his arms, and entreated Lucy to follow him, which she did, clinging, unperceived by him, to Adrienne's dress. As soon as the latter was borne into the open air, she recovered. A carriage was found, and the two friends got in, pouring forth fervent thanks to their preserver.

Of course, Mr Henry next morning called at their hotel. Lucy, yielding to an instinctive wish of delaying a painful discovery, sent word she should be happy to receive his visit in the evening. It is proper to remark here, that in Lucy the eyes were in no way disfigured, and even without any veil, at first sight, her infirmity might have passed unnoticed. Mr Henry Lisson, who had only seen her once by daylight, and then her veil was, as usual, down, could have no idea that she was blind.

In the evening, Mr Lisson returned to pay his respects. Lucy and Adrienne received him. The conversation naturally turned at first upon the yesterday's alarm of fire. Lucy found once more in the young artist that cordial politeness, those amiable manners, which had struck her before. She even fancied that she discerned in his voice, when he addressed himself to her, a certain tenderness of intonation. She took good care not to call for lights, but this did not appear extraordinary, for the air was so pure and balmy, that the party continued to sit and chat upon a balcony overlooking the public walk. When the moment came for taking leave, the voice of the young man betrayed a slight vexation. He hoped to have the pleasure next day, he said, of seeing the ladies—dwelling with a marked emphasis on the word seeing.

The following evening he came at the same hour, and he was scarcely seated when he began with : 'Miss Lucy, I have brought one of my drawings, of which I wish to have your judgment. It is a sketch of that very picturesque spot where I met you the first time. When the candles come, you will see whether I have succeeded.'

No further delay was possible. Lucy rang for lights in a state of inexpressible agitation. Adrienne, who guessed what her friend felt, put her arm round her waist. Lucy took the drawing in her hand, and bursting into tears, ‘Mr Lisson,’ said she, ‘the light of the lamp just placed on the chimney is shed around in vain for me. Look at me : I cannot see what you shew me : I am blind !’

This unexpected revelation struck the young painter dumb. After a few minutes, however, he sought to excuse himself with much emotion. ‘Forgive me, Miss Lucy,’ said he ; ‘I have very unintentionally caused you much pain.’

From this moment, Henry became more kind, more tender. His visits were renewed every day, and his conversations with Lucy grew more and more intimate. For her part, the poor girl let herself go to the bent of her inclination. ‘And why should he not love me?’ thought she. ‘After all, what is vain bodily defect compared to the treasures of tenderness I feel in my heart ? Cannot these suffice to make a man happy, who is himself susceptible of generous affection ?’

Lucy’s aunt, too, had taken a great fancy for the young artist ; and when the little party left Toulouse, she did not hesitate to give Mr Lisson a pressing invitation to the Château de Sens ; and a fortnight later, he joined the ladies there. His manners towards Lucy were as respectful and affectionate as ever. He shewed continual solicitude for her. If there was a hedge to get through, or a stile to be crossed, his attention on such occasions took a peculiar character for her. He it was who always appeared the least venturous, so that he contrived to make her forget her unfortunate infirmity. One day he said to her : ‘My choice is decidedly fixed. I shall be a statuary ;’ and at the same time he presented to her a bust of herself he had just finished. What a delightful surprise to her !

It was a beautiful summer evening, and Lucy and Henry were sitting together on the terrace, enjoying the breezes perfumed with the new-mown hay. They had been chatting a long time. Lucy had been trying, by a deep analysis of her own impressions, to make him understand those combinations of the senses of touch, of hearing, and perhaps also of smell, which rendered present for her the palpable forms of things. She was telling him, that it seemed as if an indefinable moral force united her to those around her, to those who were dear to her, by ties the strength of which nothing could equal ; for instance, that it was impossible for her to imagine that there existed a means by which she could feel better than she did at that moment that he was there before her—beside her.

Lucy's words became very impressive, and presently she thought she perceived that Henry made a sudden gesture, which he as suddenly repressed with a sigh. A moment after, having herself made a slight movement, something fell from her waist : it was a rose which he had given her the day before. Henry picked it up, and pressed it to his lips. Lucy perceived this, and, carried away by an irresistible impulse, she said : ‘Henry, can you love a poor infirm being like me?’ For the first time, then, Henry gave vent to his feelings. At the very first sight of Lucy in the valley by the side of the stream, he had felt one of those mysterious impressions, which can only be compared to an electric shock. This feeling had been strengthened when he met her on two or three different occasions, but he really loved only from the moment her infirmity was revealed to him ; for his was one of those choice natures whose affections live in devotion and sacrifice. Lucy was her own mistress. The two lovers exchanged their vows in the face of heaven.

But this happiness was destined to be too soon imbibed. Clorinda began to have some idea of the real state of things. A marriage between Henry and her niece would have overthrown certain projects of her own, with which we shall become acquainted presently, and on which she had set her heart. She made haste, therefore, to pour into Lucy's mind the poison of an odious suspicion. It was very evident, she told her niece, that all Henry sought was her fortune. How could she hope, continued the good lady, afflicted as she was with the greatest misfortune that could affect the beauty of a woman, that she had the capability of inspiring with a real passion a handsome young man, who might have his choice of the most beautiful ? This insinuation struck poor Lucy to the heart, and she became deeply unhappy. Henry perceived the change, and pressed her for an explanation of the cause. Lucy at once gave it him, repeating word for word what her aunt had said.

It is unnecessary to relate the indignation and the protestations of the young artist. ‘And yet,’ added he, ‘your aunt only holds the language of the world. Yes ; for the vulgar, she is in the right. I have no fortune, and of course I must be a fortune-hunter, who am paying you court for your money. The world always supposes some vile calculation, because society is full of such. In the eyes of the great number, a noble elevation of feeling, a devoted attachment, is mere romance. Such odious suspicions shall not soil the purity of the tenderness with which you have inspired me. It shall not be said, that you have allowed yourself to be carried away by a thoughtless impulse. No ! Try me. I will submit with joy : I will work to deserve you : I will earn fame and fortune ; and when I shall come, and lay them at your feet, people must then acknowledge that it is you I loved, and not your riches.’

‘Yes,’ answered Lucy ; ‘let it be so. We will pay this tribute to the world and its prejudices. We will delay our happiness, to render it more solid.’ With these words, she took from her finger a ring, and gave it to Henry, saying : ‘My friend, your betrothed gives you this : your bride will receive it back with joy, when you judge the hour come to bring it to her.’ It was agreed that Henry Lisson, immediately after Adrienne’s marriage, should leave the château, where her wedding was to take place in a few days, for Adrienne was just about to marry one of her cousins, to whom she was greatly attached, and who loved her tenderly. The day following that of the marriage was indeed a sad day for Lucy, who lost at once the only two beings who loved her for herself—Adrienne and Henry.

The coolness which had subsisted between Lucy and her aunt from the day of her odious insinuations, soon gave place, on the part of the latter, to apparently friendly advances. This designing woman had a secret plan, on account of which it was necessary to propitiate her niece. This plan was just to secure Lucy's hand, and especially her fortune, to a protégé of her own—a cousin of the good lady's late husband, the Baron de Stacy. This person, who, according to Clorinda, possessed every perfection, was a man of about six-and-thirty, a gamester, a debauchee, and over head and ears in debt. He soon made his appearance at the château, and took great pains to make himself pleasing to Lucy—all in vain. His visit was not long this time, but a few days after he returned, and seemed to take up settled quarters in the château. Lucy had hoped to induce his departure, by the excessive coldness of her reception; but he did not seem to take any notice of it. At last, one day he made her a declaration of love in form. Lucy answered frankly and firmly, that her affections were irrevocably engaged. Nevertheless, he did not give up the point, and continued his unpleasant assiduities. His passionate bursts, his tragical airs, only rendered him daily more intolerable. Lucy could read in his tones the exaggeration of a sentiment which was not felt. His voice sounded to her well-exercised ear like an instrument out of tune.

This resistance on her part irritated the plotting couple, who thought that perhaps her opposition would be weakened if they could separate her from the persons who were devoted to her. A set of manœuvres with this object began, without striking at first the poor orphan. One day, Beraud came to her, and said, that he was growing old—that the care of the garden was too much for him—and that it would make him very happy if his lady would give him the place at the lodge, the keeper being lately dead. The lodge was so very little removed, that his wife should continue to sleep at the château, and wait on her mistress. This request was granted. But very soon the arrangement proved inconvenient, as the old woman could not accustom herself to pass the nights away from her husband, who, she said, might be taken ill all alone: so that Lucy felt it necessary to authorise Madame Beraud to settle herself entirely in the lodge. Beraud's wish in the first instance, and the subsequent uneasiness of his wife, were all owing to the unperceived management of Clorinda and her confederate.

At the same time, the visits of Adrienne, settled at some distance from the château, first became rare, and at last ceased entirely. In after-days, she related to her friend the wilful rudeness of her aunt, which had obliged her to stay away. Lucy had now only Marie, her maid; but this girl fell ill, and went for a change of air to her friends—small farmers in the neighbourhood; and when, as had been agreed, she was about to return on her recovery, Clorinda contrived to marry her to a young farmer, who took his bride home. So, day by day, the poor orphan found herself more solitary and more miserable.

It may be matter of surprise, that she opposed no resistance to these manœuvres, of which at length she could not but see the aim. To account for this apparently apathetic disposition to submit, and let things take their course, we must understand the peculiar position of a blind person. Concentrated and thoughtful, the blind will naturally come to ripened and firm resolutions, and to certain very positive opinions on men and things. But in the various actions of every-day life, they are necessarily dependent and subordinate to others, and they consequently take habits of resignation. Blind persons will be obstinate in their internal reasoning, and compliant in their external conduct.

Six months had slipped away since the departure of Mr Henry Lisson, and Lucy had received from him several letters, which were her only consolation. Suddenly this also failed. The orphan wrote, but no answer came. What could she think of this silence! By degrees, she was led to suppose that Henry had forsaken her—was false to her. Nevertheless, was it quite sure that he was unfaithful to all his vows? Might not some unforeseen circumstance have prevented his writing? ‘Suppose,’ thought she, ‘his letters have been intercepted.’ Lucy clung to this idea like a shipwrecked mariner to some floating spar of the vessel broken to pieces by the storm. To clear her dreadful doubt, she thought of writing to Adrienne, and to desire her husband to make inquiries. But how could she be sure that the letter would reach its address? Fortunately, our heroine had, unsuspected by all, a messenger of whose faithfulness she was sure.

In the general dispersion of all those on whom she could depend, one single individual had escaped proscription. It was a young boy of about twelve years of age, who used to lead the cows to pasture on the neighbouring hills. In past days, when Lucy was happy and cheerful, she had often met the child in some of the courts of the château. Little Henriot was a poor orphan, of whom one of her labourers had taken the care, and his lively repartees had amused and interested her. She thought a good deal about him, and taught him. First, she made him learn to read. A blind person teach one who is blessed with sight to read! How could it be? Not only the thing was not impossible, but did not offer the difficulties that may be supposed. It was, indeed, a very simple thing. The spelling-book which he used, Lucy had it also with letters in relief, so that he read with his eyes the letter, the syllable, or the word, which she touched with her finger. He learned thus, in a short time, to read, aided by his own quick intelligence, guided by his patient instructress. Afterwards, she taught him how to cast up accounts, and at the same time made him learn his catechism. But when days of sorrow came, these lessons became more rare, and at last ceased: the poor cow-herd was forgotten.

But he had not forgotten. More than once he came near the windows of his benefactress’ apartment, and let her know his presence by some mountain-song. This apartment was situated at the further end of one of the wings of the château. Attached to it was a terrace, surrounded by a parapet, from which a little staircase led into a meadow bordered by a thick hedge and a ditch. This was Lucy's own private domain, where she liked to retire, especially since the guests in the château were so disagreeable. Henriot, to whom neither hedge nor ditch was any obstacle, used to come that way to her windows. He was always accompanied by a large dog, one of the race of the Pyrenees, called Mountain, which took a great attachment for the poor forlorn girl.

So Henriot was the messenger whom Lucy chose to carry her letter to the post-town, about two leagues off, and put it safely in the letter-box. For greater certainty, the answer was to be brought by Adrienne herself. Many days passed; at last, one morning Adrienne came. When the two friends had retired to Lucy's room, Adrienne pressed her silently to her bosom, and some tears dropped from her eyes upon the poor blind girl's face. In two words, the result of the inquiries made by Adrienne's husband was this: Henry was no longer in Paris. Ill, and melancholy, he had gone to Rome in company with two young artists. He lived there retired and sad, visiting habitually only one foreign family, in which there was a very beautiful young lady!

The first effect of this news was terrible on poor Lucy. She neither wept nor complained, but fell into a kind of stupor. At length a torrent of tears came to her relief, and then, being somewhat more calm, she desired to remain a short time alone. This moment of solitude she passed in imploring God fervently to shed into her soul that holy resignation which can only be found in Him. She rose from her knees, strengthened by her prayer. 'All is over,' said she to Adrienne; 'we will never speak of him more.' Adrienne remained some days at the château to cheer her friend, whom at last she left calm, and apparently resigned.

A week after, one day that Lucy was alone in her room, one of the maid-servants of the château came in, and throwing herself at the feet of her mistress, implored her to save her from the persecutions of the Baron de Stacy. The poor orphan was astounded at this revelation. But she no sooner recovered the first shock, than she felt that a being capable of such villany ought no longer to remain under the same roof with herself. Now or never was the time to take a decided step. Under pretence of concluding a pending bargain for the sale of some wood to the mayor of a neighbouring village, who was a wood-merchant, Lucy sent for this magistrate. He was a man half-gentleman, half-farmer, knowing, self-interested in business, but conscientious and resolute. He came immediately on receiving Lucy's invitation; asked to inspect carefully the portion of wood in question; and then returned to breakfast—an operation which the worthy functionary always went through in a style that left to the orphan full time to execute the vigorous measure she meditated. Having disposed things properly, she sent to request her aunt to come to her apartment; and there, without any circumlocution, she informed the good lady, that she had just discovered a circumstance, which did not allow of the Baron de Stacy remaining any longer in the château, and that she required he should leave it instantly.

Clorinda was at first thunderstruck; but soon recovering herself, exclaimed against such an order given on a first impulse, and which she did not hesitate to characterise as an unworthy insult. ‘Madame,’ replied Lucy with great coolness, ‘I will submit to the direction of no one in my house. I insist upon it, that your relation quits it this day, for his presence is a disgrace.’ Her aunt interrupted her with vehement exclamations, and striking violently the table before her. ‘Hear me,’ said Lucy with perfect calmness: ‘the mayor is in the next room. He is not aware yet of the real motive which made me send for him. Do you choose to occasion a scandalous scene? As you please. If I must have recourse to law in order to remain mistress of my own house, I will.’

This provident precaution of Lucy drove her aunt to frenzy. Clorinda declared, that to turn her cousin out of doors was doing so to herself. ‘My intention,’ returned Lucy, ‘was to dismiss from my house the Baron de Stacy, and not my father’s sister; but if you consider yourself inseparable’—

‘Enough!’ cried Clorinda with stifled rage; ‘I understand you. Well, since you drive me to extremities, you shall find that I know how to take my revenge.’ Two hours later, she had left the château with the baron.

Once more free, Lucy dismissed a few servants on whom rested some suspicion, and then she sent for Marie, and settled her with her husband at the château. Her mind began to recover some serenity, but this was not to last long.

It was the most beautiful summer evening imaginable, when nature, all softness and peace, makes it a delicious thing to feel and to breathe. Lucy felt tempted to go down from her little terrace into the meadow below. Presently she heard from the road, which passed hard by, a plaintive voice calling for help. It was a crippled beggar, who had fallen, and could not rise without assistance. Lucy’s kind heart was struck with pity, and she opened the little door that led to the road. At the same instant she was violently seized, and dragged away; a handkerchief was tied tight over her mouth; and she felt herself thrown into a carriage, which set off at full gallop. ‘Fear nothing: no harm will be done you; but do not scream or stir.’ After having uttered these words, those who bore her off remained silent, and Lucy’s repeated and urgent questions received no answer. Her terror and despair can be more easily imagined than described.

After travelling several hours, the carriage stopped somewhere for the night. Our unfortunate heroine passed it on a chair, in the midst of incessant present terror, and of the most perplexing alarm for the future. Here, again, she turned to Him who is never invoked in vain; and she gathered courage and resignation from prayer. At break of day they set off again. The jolting of the carriage made her sensible that they were following a cross-road, and when the postilion cracked his whip, the sound convinced her that they were in the midst of a wood. At last they came to the journey's end, and the poor young lady was introduced into a room, where she found her aunt, who threw her arms round Lucy's neck with demonstrations of the most exaggerated sensibility. Perfidious wretch! To Lucy's pressing questions, she answered that the first thing necessary was to take rest—explanations could come a little later.

Lucy remained alone in the room, and having ascertained that she was so, and by touching all round the walls, that she had really shut herself in with perfect security, fell into a deep sleep, which recovered her from the moral and physical fatigue she had undergone. Afterwards, having refused to leave her room, dinner was brought to her. The following night passed calmly, and without any incident. The next morning, her aunt pressed her to come down into the garden. Lucy consented, from a vague presentiment that, later, it might be important to know, as far as was possible, the details of the place that held her captive. Her aunt continued, as the day before, to pour out unceasing protestations of devotion and tenderness. Her part was to try and persuade her niece that, whatever might have been her former conduct, she was now her assured protectress. Lucy feigned to believe it.

Soon the baron came. A long and stormy conversation ensued between him and the heiress. On the one hand, there was the barefaced avowal of a fixed determination to attain his purpose at any cost; and, on the other, as firm a resolution not to give way, and the expression of the most unbounded contempt. The enraged baron went so far as to threaten Lucy with a scandalous lawsuit. ‘Beware, madame,’ cried he; ‘there are means of proving that your father and mother were not united in lawful wedlock. Consent to be mine, and you will save your mother's honour. I leave you a week to reflect.’

walking in the garden towards evening, when suddenly she heard, on the other side of the wall which separated her from the surrounding country, an animal running fast, and then a barking. It was Mountain, Henriot's dog. She called his name. 'Thank God,' cried the boy, 'I have found you at last, miss!' It was the instinct of the dog that had led Henriot along her track. A plan of escape, to be executed the next evening, was quietly settled. Henriot was to hide himself in some bushes near the little gate of the garden, and wait for her. This once agreed on, the orphan retired with a calm mind.

Next day before dawn she went down into the garden, opened the little door, and ventured forth into the country beyond at all hazards. After walking for about an hour, she heard loud shouts behind her: it was the voice of the baron. He pursues her—he catches her. Suddenly barking is heard, then the sound of a struggle, then cries for help. It was Mountain, which had seized the baron by the throat, and still held him tight. A cart coming that way, the wounded man was placed in it, and carried home senseless. As to Lucy, Henriot led her to a woodman's cottage, where she found kind hospitality. With some difficulty a carriage was got, and a person on whom she could depend, to drive her to the Château de Sens, which she at length reached in safety.

Some weeks passed in undisturbed tranquillity. In the meantime, Lucy learned that the wounds of the baron were less dangerous than had been at first supposed, and that he was almost recovered. In fact, she soon had proof that he was still in existence, and that his evil nature continued in full vigour. She received legal notice, requiring her to give up possessions to which she was not lawfully entitled, she only being a natural daughter, and having thus only title on M. de Marne's property to that portion allotted by the law of France to illegitimate children. Lucy remembered perfectly having possessed among her papers the marriage-certificate of her parents, drawn up in French and in English; but when she sought for it in the box which held all her family documents, it was not to be found.

It does not enter into our plan to give the details of the lawsuit. Suffice it to say, that Lucy lost it by the first judgment, and appealed to a superior court. Not choosing, in the meantime, to inhabit the Château de Sens while it was in litigation, Lucy retired with Marie to board at a convent at T——. She had already passed several months there, when one day Marie ran into her room oppressed and breathless with emotion. ‘Ah, mademoiselle, a gentleman—down stairs—come, come quick!’ And she dragged her mistress along into a large parlour, where the boarders received their visitors. A gentleman, in truth, was waiting for Lucy. It was Henry Lisson. The tone in which he simply pronounced her name conveyed a whole justification. The two lovers had been victims of an infamous deception. First, several of their letters had been suppressed : then, it was cunningly contrived that notice should reach the sister of Mr Lisson, through a channel she thought unexceptionable, that Lucy had given up Henry, and that her marriage with the Baron de Stacy was a settled thing. Henry wrote several letters, which all remained unanswered. This silence he construed as a confirmation of that which his sister had heard, and, in despair, he set out for Italy. When he returned to Paris, he learned by the public papers the issue of the lawsuit, which deprived Lucy of all her possessions, and instantly set off to come to her. ‘Now that you are poor,’ ended the young man, ‘and that those considerations which stopped us formerly no longer exist, will you at length consent to make me the happiest of men?’ After some hesitation, Lucy yielded, and arrangements were made for the marriage.

In the meantime, the agent whom Lucy had sent to England to procure a certificate of the marriage of her father and mother, returned with the properly authenticated documents. These being produced, obtained a verdict which reinstated Lucy in the full and entire possession of her property. Her every wish gratified, rich, beloved, at the moment of uniting herself for ever to the man of her choice, who would not envy such happiness as Lucy's?

It was the very eve of the long wished-for day. The evening slipped away in gentle converse. Henry was happy, but his movements betrayed a certain agitation. It was growing late, and still he lingered: it seemed as if he did not know how to tear himself away from his betrothed. At last he rose to go. There was something convulsive in the pressure of his hand, a strangeness in the tone with which he said farewell. Lucy felt seized by an indefinable anxiety: she could not sleep. Are there situations in which God permits the soul to have a confused prescience of impending misfortune?

Next morning, about eight o'clock, a servant of the hotel in which Henry lodged came to the convent, and broke to Lucy the news that his master was wounded. The preceding day, he had been publicly insulted, and furiously challenged, by the Baron de Stacy. A duel —how detestable are such encounters—had ensued. Lucy, almost frantic, flew with Marie to the hotel. The unfortunate young man was almost lifeless. At sight of his bride, he made a slight motion, uttered the name of Lucy, and expired! The miscreant De Stacy escaped.

Sincere piety alone can pour balm into such wounds. Lucy took refuge in her religious feelings, and by degrees recovered calm and peace. She made of her riches a patrimony for the poor, and her life is a continual act of beneficence.

Such is a glimpse of a domestic tragedy which took place a few years ago in France. The whole particulars were exactly as they are here recorded.

THE LITTLE MAN WITH THE WIG.

ONE morning, I was about to leave Kendal by the stage-coach for the south. While the vehicle was getting ready, I ascended to the box, which, for many sufficient reasons, I always select in good weather. There I spread my cloak on the seat, by way of establishing my right of prepossession ; and as the coach was not to start for some minutes, I descended to stretch my legs—not that I was then in need of such exercise, but perhaps from some vague idea of meeting the coming disease. On returning to re-ascend, what should I behold but a little shred of a man occupying the place which I had laid out for my own comparatively portly person ! He was an old withered little creature, dressed in a brown greatcoat and a gray worsted wig ; and it was evident, from the firm projection of his under lip, and the keen settled eye with which he regarded me as I approached, that his mind was completely made up on the subject of his intrusion. I addressed him, nevertheless, with a respectful request, that he would give me that place, which, he might observe from my cloak, had been bespoken before he came upon the ground.

‘ I am first here,’ said the little man, in a broad Cumberland dialect, ‘ and ma mooney is as good as yours, I reckon.’

‘ But the rules of travelling, sir,’ said I mildly.

To all my remonstrances, however, he only answered : ‘ Ma mooney is as good as yours ;’ and so I had to give up the point.

I was entreated to go inside, where there was only a single lady ; and though it is as hard to be obliged to take an inside place instead of an out, as it is to drink porter in place of small-beer, I half thought of complying ; only, while I put on my gloves, I begged the coachman would understand, that, in case it rained, which I foresaw it would—and some drops fell in confirmation of my opinion—we were not to be intruded upon by wet outside passengers.

‘Oh!’ said the little man, ‘I can put oop my umbrella.’

‘Yes,’ I replied, ‘if you want to bring the lightning upon yourself and the coach! ’

‘It wont thoonder, will it?’

‘It looks like it, sir,’ said the coachman drily.

‘Then I am in!’ said the little man.

‘I protest against that,’ said I.

‘I’ll pye the deeffference,’ said the little man, and down he swung. The money was pocketed, and I took my seat on the coach - box. The sun immediately shone forth, having been merely raising the vapour for the forenoon, and we set off with the usual noise and velocity.

The drive for several miles was delightful, and the coachman was good enough to pause a minute at Leven Hall, that admirable specimen of an old English manor-house, so as to admit of our enjoying the sight of its antique gardens. We had not been again in motion above a minute, when something like a female scream from the interior broke through the rattle of the wheels. ‘What can the little man in the wig have been doing?—what is it?’ burst from us all. It soon appeared that the little man in the wig had stretched out his head to see the gardens, and, in pulling it back, had knocked off his hat, which was lying a little way behind on the road. This he pointed out to the coachman, who, contrary to all proper rules, but with abundance of good-nature, went back to fetch it.

The horses had just started, when another shout was heard, louder than before, from the same little wretch in the wig. It appeared he had lost his insufferable wig at the same time with his hat, but only missed it upon finding his hat too large. With equal promptitude, but less good - will, the coachman went back again, and brought the wig, but vowed he would not alight a third time, if he should have lost his head. This served for the first stage.

We reached Millthorpe, and changed coaches ; but that was not generally known. We had hardly started, therefore, when there was again a tremendous shout. What now ? The same ever-troublesome passenger. He had been dozing in the left coach, and only aroused by a stable-boy going to clean him out ! A fat man in black, who sat behind, was the announcer-general of these disasters, and gave them at last in such a quiet, matter-of-course form, that it began to be perfectly ludicrous.

We now came to another stage, where the passengers again got down. In a few minutes, a horse in the stable gave a scream, such as he does when he is angry and kicks, and presently there was a rush to the stable-door.

' Oh, nothing more than our old friend, the little man with the wig,' quoth the man in black, turning quietly away ; ' he has been going too near a horse, and has been kicked.' The little fellow came out, looking most ruefully.

' The ungrateful brute ! I only poot ma hand on him in kindness ! ' said he ; and finished the sentence by squeezing his knee.

' He doesn't understand you,' said the coachman. ' Come, bundlle in ! '

' I would rather go atop,' said he ; ' and there is room.'

' Well, well.'

I had given my seat to the lady, who felt the coach too close, and I began to find the country not interesting ; so I went inside, and was alone. To divert myself in these circumstances, I began of course to think of home, which to every man is or ought to be a refuge of pleasant thought.

Crash !—Hallo ! ' What's that now ? ' cried the coachman.

' The little man in the wig,' quoth the man in black.

' What has he done ? '

' Only broken one of the coach-windows.'

' Well, if a have broken a window, I'll pye the window,'

' You have broken it,' said I; ' and, what's more, my meditations.'

' Your what?'

' A meditation, sir, that I wouldn't have had broken for money.'

' If t'ou canst shew me that I ha' broken onything that had a reet to be in ma waye, I'll pye it—a can do no more.'

The little fellow, in trying to find ease for his bones, which were probably cropping out a little too much, had turned to the side of the coach, and one of his boots, not being restrained by the slackened sinews of his knee, had come in contact with the pane. The damage, however, was paid, and we soon after reached Lancaster.

Here we had a certain time given us, in order to see the town ; and in due season most of us were once more at our posts.

' All right !' cried the guard, and the coach drove off.

' Noa, noa !' shouted something behind us ; and the coachman looked back.

' What is it ?' said he.

' The little man with the wig !' quoth his old cicerone.

The coachman (a new one) could hardly keep his seat with laughter, as he saw the tremendously indignant stare of the little man, while he reproachfully held up his watch. ' Ma time is not oop by many minutes,' said he.

' Look at the clock,' said the coachman.

' A don' mynd the clock : ma watch is reet, and I'll mantaane it. Bou't her only ten days ago, and cost me four pound.'

' Then,' said the fat man in black, ' she's a dead bargain, for I see she is not going.'

' Not goan ! a most ha' forgotten to wind her oop—a most.'

' No matter—mount !' and with that, he once more took his seat, and we proceeded.

There are few objects of particular interest on this road for many miles ; our chief amusement, therefore, was in looking after the gambols of our little traveller, and noticing how uniformly and ingeniously he contrived to be all but left behind, and this apparently without the least intention.

The coachman, it chanced, was exceedingly morose, and the old man saw it. He could, therefore, have no intention of using freedoms, yet every time we started after a halt, it was necessary to draw up; and the answer as to what was amiss was uniformly, ‘The little man with the wig!’ At one time, he had gone off before us, and there was first a buzz among the passengers, and then a general request to stop. ‘What is it?’ ‘Only the little man with the wig; he is not in his place.’ He was now sought for, but could not be found. ‘Perhaps he left here?’ The way-bill was examined. ‘No; he is booked to Liverpool.’ ‘Must find him then.’ ‘No; can’t stop for any man. My time is up.’ And, after every inquiry, he was abandoned to his fate; but we had not proceeded five minutes, when there was a screech from the roadside from the object of our inquiry. While we were seeking him, that he might not be left behind, he had manfully walked on, and was wondering what had become of us, and even held up his watch in accusation.

At a little place near Preston, we had halted to change, and one of the horses was said to have met with an accident. He must do his work, however, and the coachman had mounted, when all at once it was discovered that this wretched creature was again absent. He had gone to examine the accident, about which he knew nothing, and never dreamed of noticing that the coachman was on his box. ‘Strap him down with the luggage!’ shouted the coachman, as the little fellow was hurried away. The guard said he would certainly get killed or lost, and we were all of the same opinion. The most ludicrous thing was the look of astonishment with which he always found himself in fault. All experience seemed thrown away upon him. He was as much taken by surprise at the fiftieth as at the first mistake. He had hardly cooled from one fret, till he was in another.

Scrape followed scrape, and misfortune chased misfortune, and yet the chance of farther scrapes and misfortunes seemed still undiminished.

At Preston, the case became more serious than ever. He had got down as usual, and was standing at once in sight, and quite out of danger, and this by the express direction of the coachman, who at last began to relax so far as to notice the singularity of the old creature's adventures. While we were all enjoying this, and even the old man himself half joining with us, there was a scream from the people about us, and, looking round, what was it? A coach had come up, and was dashing through the archway leading from the inn-yard, when, who should be in the way but—the little man with the wig! While looking at us, he was struck by the pole, and, clinging to it, was stuck up like a forked radish upon the stone that guarded the wall, the pole close to his throat, but fortunately not upon it. His look was indescribable. It seemed to say, as plainly as look could speak: ‘There now! you see that, by following your directions, I am in more danger than ever!’ He was picked out of his perilous situation, and hurried into the coach—the coachman half laughing, and declaring that it would not be possible for him to deliver him safely. At last he was in, and there were no farther stops; consequently, we concluded that our sport was ended. But not so. He came out on the road at the place of his destination. The bundles he had appeared almost innumerable; and the coachman, as every successive one was pulled out, cried: ‘Is that all?’ and was answered: ‘Just another, if t’ou’ll have the kindness.’ At last the whole seemed to have been discharged, and the little man paid his trifle, the coachman declaring he had never worked so hard for anything in his life; so we started, congratulating ourselves on our escape.

‘Hallo!’ from the guard.

‘Eh! anything wrong?’

‘Yes, the little man with the wig!’ said our obese friend once more,

'T'ou didn't see a green striped carpet-bag,' said he, almost breathless—'didst t'ou?'

'What! was that yours?' The guard again opened his receptacles; again rummaged them—not there!

'What is it you're seeking?' shouted his friend from the door at which he stopped, at the same time holding up the carpet-bag, already delivered.

'Ah! a ha' gotten it!—all rect—good-day to you;' and for the last time, we saw the tormenting little man with the wig!

So ends this tale of a coach-goblin—for, at the time, I could hardly consider him in any other light. Perhaps, at home, as Bob Acres says, and out of harm's way, the little man with the wig was a most respectable member of society. It was evident, however, from his proneness to coach-accidents and scrapes, that he was a man who, in circumstances at all extraordinary, and when forming part of a social system, was calculated to derange his own comfort and that of every person in contact with him—not perhaps, from ill dispositions, but from want of attention and punctuality. There are many such characters in life; but I never met with one in a more extreme or more amusing form than the LITTLE MAN WITH THE WIG.

ANECDOTE OF A LUNATIC.

'WHAT is honour?' says Falstaff. 'A word. What is in that word honour? What is that honour? Air.' Though the witty knight thus reached the conclusion that honour, being neither able 'to set a limb,' nor to 'take away the grief of a wound,' was a non-existent thing, the very fact of his making such a catechetical inquiry into its nature and qualities shews that, in his days, honour had been somewhat of a puzzle, as it certainly is in ours. It may be air, but sometimes it is air in commotion, with the force of a potent breeze to fill the sails of prosperity, or a hurricane to overturn and destroy. The most heterogeneous things are done in its name, and the most irreconcilable things reconciled through its influence. A man of honour may cheat honest tradesmen, and still be held not the less honourable; but if he does not pay a gambler whom he strongly suspects of cheating him, he ceases to be a man of honour. A man of honour may ruin the happiness of his dearest friend, and yet be not the less a man of honour—provided always that, in addition to the injury primarily inflicted, he is willing to go out and shoot at the friend in question. In short, the most extraordinary incongruities go to the making up of the compound, honour, at the present day. Of some features in the modern man of honour's character, every principle of reason and justice bids us disapprove; but in other respects, certainly, there is something fine and noble in the ideas entertained on this subject. We have a little story to tell, which will at once illustrate our meaning, and shew how the preceding ideas have been at this moment suggested to us.

Visiting lately a rural district of Scotland, which, for good reasons, we do not wish to name particularly, we were led to pay a visit to a small private asylum for lunatics—a scene always peculiarly attractive to those who take an interest in the philosophy of mind. Everything was found, to be in a most comfortable and creditable condition—as unlike as possible to that of all such places twenty or thirty years ago. One individual, out of the small number of persons confined here, arrested our special attention. He was a man past mid-age, upright in person, and with that general bearing which at once indicates the military man. His manner was quick and lively, or rather restless, and this was, in truth, the only feature in his deportment from which one could have guessed anything to be amiss with him. He spoke rapidly, and with apparent good sense, and seemed to take a pleasure in talking with visitors, as well as to have an anxiety to entertain them. His power to do so was in a great measure confined to the exhibition of his room, and the few curiosities contained in it. He had everything in excellent order—the habits of the soldier in this respect being evidently strong within him. All his books were neatly arranged, and his numerous papers were docketed and shelved with the greatest regularity. These papers consisted chiefly of memorials to government or the war-office, the drawing up of which formed the great occupation, we were told, of his days, and the main theme of his conversation. Altogether, he spoke so sensibly, and everything about him had such an appearance of order and respectability, that it was impossible not to feel an interest in the poor man, or to avoid entertaining some curiosity as to his past history. Fortunately, a friend was able to supply the desired information on this point.

‘Poor Captain B——,’ said our informant, ‘is a victim to the niceties of military honour at the present day, though, in some measure, as you shall hear, he assuredly deserved his fate. He served with credit in our army during the early part of the late continental war, and was subsequently sent out with his regiment to one of the West India islands, for the possession of which the French were then disputing with us. The British took the island, and remained stationed in it for some time, but they were in turn attacked and expelled by the French. A considerable number of our soldiery were taken prisoners, and among them was Captain B——. He was a man unpossessed of that degree of mental fortitude which can render endurable any chance occurring in the way of duty, and fretted greatly under the misfortune that befell him. Nevertheless, like others, he gave his parole not to attempt an escape, and on the faith thereof, was permitted to enjoy a good deal of licence in his movements. He and his companions were not permitted to roam wherever they chose, indeed, on the island, but they were allowed the freedom of a large open space for the benefit of air and exercise.

‘Such had been the state of things for some weeks, when, one day, a British ship was seen hovering off the island. Captain B—— saw it among others, and instantly the possibility of an escape occurred to him. If he could quit his place of confinement, and put off in a small boat from the coast, under cover of the shades of evening, the probability was, that he would readily reach the ship. But, then, his parole—the word of honour given by him not to attempt flight! Captain B—— was not blind to the impropriety of breaking a pledge of this kind; but the desire of escape gained the ascendancy over all other feelings, and smoothed down all objections. That night, without communicating his intention to any one, the captain contrived to leave his room, clambered over the wall encircling his place of confinement, and made his way safely to the beach. The moonlight enabled him to see the British ship at but a very short distance, and he got hold of a small boat without being observed. In this vessel, after a long and laborious pull at the oars, the captain found himself at last by the side of his countrymen's ship, and was taken in greatly exhausted.

'To the officer in command, Captain B—— said nothing about his parole, but when conveyed to Jamaica, where his regiment then lay with the rest of the forces on the West India station, he found himself obliged to tell the truth, knowing that, sooner or later, it would be learned from others, whether he himself told it or not. After the excitement attending the act of escape had passed off, he had begun to reflect, with some uneasiness, on the light in which the matter might be viewed by his superiors in command. But the reality was far more harassing than he had at all anticipated. His colonel, when informed of the affair, threw him instantly into arrest, and summoned a court-martial to inquire into the matter. The captain's statement was decisive against himself. He admitted having given his parole, and having broken it. The decision against him was unanimous, and to the effect, that his "conduct was most unworthy a British officer and gentleman, and calculated to throw disgrace on the whole service." It was, moreover, resolved, that he should be instantly sent back again to the French station, with the explanation, that “the British army, to a man, reprobated the conduct of Captain B—— in breaking his parole.”

‘Accordingly, by the earliest opportunity, the unlucky officer was reconveyed to his late place of confinement among the French. His state of mind, under these circumstances, was pitiable. To be so cast off and repudiated by his own friends, and to be sent back to meet still greater disgrace, and perhaps punishment, at the hands of the enemy, was indeed calculated to gall his feelings most deeply. The results of his re-transmission to the French station made the case much worse. When he was landed under a flag of truce, and conveyed to the quarters of the general in command, that personage immediately called his principal officers about him, and held a consultation with them: Captain B—— was present, and every eye was turned upon him with indignant contempt. The conference was short, and ended in the commander sitting down to write a note, which bore, that “the French were highly gratified with the politeness of the British in sending back Captain B——, and sincerely believed that every man in the British army must despise his conduct in violating his word of honour; but that they (the French) begged leave to return him to his friends, as they declined keeping, or having anything further to do with, so mean a rascal.” This note was read aloud to Captain B——, and that unfortunate person was afterwards under the necessity of returning to the vessel which had brought him from Jamaica.

‘If the feeling of shame and disgrace endured by the captain was great before, it was increased tenfold on his return to Jamaica with the scornful note of the French commander. All his former friends cut him directly and avowedly. No man would speak to or associate with him, and he was ultimately obliged to petition to be sent home on the plea of bad health. In reality, his bodily health was perfectly good, but not so with his mental health. The circumstances here related preyed upon his thoughts, until reason was shaken from her throne. This change was first made apparent in England, by the incessant and lengthy memorials which he poured in upon government, all relating to his own services and sufferings, and conceived in such rambling terms as clearly to indicate the writer's state of mind. We believe that from government came the suggestion of confinement. However this may be, Captain B—— was placed in a private asylum ; and there he now is, and is likely to be for the remainder of his days. It is perhaps well that the poor man thinks himself injured, for he is rendered by that impression comparatively happy. By one breach of the laws of honour, he lost his place for ever in society, and perhaps not undeservedly ; yet, no one can regret any circumstances which tend to give him comparative ease in his, at best, most unfortunate condition.'

Whatever may be thought of the licence permitted to modern men of honour in many respects, the inviolability of a word or pledge, given even to an open enemy, is certainly, as already hinted, somewhat of a redeeming and compensating feature. It is evident, indeed, that the frequent or habitual violation of faith in such cases as that of Captain B——, would tend materially to increase the asperities of war. Trusting unreservedly to the honour of their captives, the captors may grant them a thousand freedoms which otherwise could never be accorded. A want of reliance in such cases would render the dungeon the only place of security for the prisoner. The behaviour of Captain B——, therefore, was calculated to do much practical mischief, which could only have been obviated by such a repudiation as he received at the hands of his fellow-officers. And yet how many men of honour in this world of ours daily commit acts productive of greater, or at least much more direct evil, without losing even one step in society, not to speak of being galled into madness like poor Captain B—— !

A TALE OF THE COAST-GUARD.

I HAD a conference with Sir Joseph Yorke one afternoon at Portsmouth, shortly after receiving a rather extraordinary commission from the comptroller of the Coast-Guard and the secretary of the Admiralty, and had no sooner made him acquainted with its chief features, the plan of action sketched out, and the kind of person I stood chiefly in need of to successfully carry into effect, the instructions of my superiors, than he exclaimed : ‘ Warneford, I know the very man that will suit you : Tom Davis, one of the cleverest fellows in his way I ever met with—cool as steel, and sober, too, except when off duty, as a water-cask. A native, moreover, I verily believe, of the very place you mention—certainly of Devonshire. We shall find or hear of him, I daresay, somewhere about Common-Hard. Let us after him at once. He was my cockswain for a long time, but has been many months out of a berth, and is of course hard aground ; so that I shall serve him as well as you.’

We had not far to go. The very first street we turned into presented an amusingly characteristic scene. About fifteen men, belonging to an Austrian vessel of war then in the harbour, had taken advantage of being on shore to procure themselves a supply of fresh fish, as every one of them had two or three suspended from his right-hand forefinger. They were walking, unaccompanied by an officer as far as I saw, quietly and steadily, in single-file, along the edge of the pavement, towards the harbour : when it is added that they wore braces, stocks round their necks—perhaps this was a part of shore dress—small gold rings in their ears, and had that drilled, half-military carriage which distinguishes the levies of the maritime conscriptions of continental states, the contrast they offered to the rolling gait, the loose array, the slack apparel, the tipsy, boisterous fun, and altogether devil-may-care aspect of a party of British men-of-war's-men ashore under similar circumstances, was certainly a very striking one. This was clearly the opinion of a smart, athletic English seaman, who chanced to meet the foreigners ; and instantly swinging himself off the pavement into the gutter, contemplated them as they passed with such a half-drunken yet intense look, made up of astonishment, contempt, disdain, as it is possible to conceive. He remained dumb till the last had gone by, and then slowly turning on his heel, breathed out his pent-up compassion and surprise in one emphatic exclamation : ‘ Well, I'm — ! ’

We had approached so closely, that the coarse participle which concluded the sentence was uttered almost directly in Sir Joseph's face, a circumstance which brought the sailor suddenly up in some dismay.

‘ You will be, Tom Davis,’ exclaimed the admiral, sternly enough, but for the merry twinkle of his eyes—‘ you will be, depend upon it, if you don't shake off the disgraceful habit you are giving way to. What right have you to grin and sneer at those respectable foreign A Bs, I should like to know? I am sure you couldn't toe a line of kerbstone, at this moment, as straight as they are doing it. And how would you look, I wonder, strapped up in stays and braces, your nose cocked into the air by a throat-collar, and with rings in your ears ! —eh ?'

' But aint they lubbers, your honour ?' replied Davis, quickly recovered from his momentary confusion. ' Only just look at that long, wall-sided '——

' Hold your tongue, sir ! I have recommended you to this gentleman for a particular service ; though, if he were to judge of your general conduct by present appearances, he would certainly have nothing to do with you.'

Davis mumbled out something about having nothing else to do but drink to drown care ; and as I knew from Sir Joseph, that, like hundreds of other seamen I have known, he could resolutely abstain from liquor when it was necessary to do so, and as I altogether greatly liked his aspect, especially his keen, resolute, honest look, we soon came to an understanding, and it was agreed that he should call on me early the following morning for precise instructions.

The duty to be performed had been necessitated by the following circumstances :—It had come to the knowledge of the Customs' authorities, that vast quantities of goods, silks, lace, and gloves especially, were constantly smuggled into England, chiefly along the coast of Devonshire, by a skilfully organised agency, possessed of resources so great as to baffle all ordinary means of repression. The rendezvous of the local agents of this formidable confederacy, the head-quarters of which were without question in London, was supposed to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of Sidmouth, the charming Devonshire village on the little River Sid, which issues into the sea near the beautiful bay contiguous to the Dorset line of coast. There was no blame attributed to the Preventive Service attached to the locality, either ashore or afloat ; but it was deemed necessary that the cunning and novel expedients had recourse to in order to defraud the national revenue, should be met, and, if possible, defeated, by similar devices exerted in its defence. For this purpose, I had the honour of being selected. All doubtful as well as reliable information in possession of the authorities was placed in my hands, and the general course of action indicated, but still leaving me a large discretionary margin ; and it was ordered that no lack of means should stand in the way of the successful accomplishment of the mission with which I was intrusted.

At my interview the next morning with Davis, I was glad to find that his natural intelligence, his quick mother-wit, was as strongly marked as his fine seaman-like qualities. He was a native of Plymouth, and known by several persons about Sidmouth as a prime sailor, though just then out of luck. It was not long, either, before I discovered that he, like most of us, had his El Dorado, with its attendant houri, in shadowy perspective. In other words, that a fishing-bark of some fifteen tons burden—a cottage on the Devonshire coast, with scarlet-bean or other runners climbing up its front, and festooning an arbour, in which a pipe might now and then be sweetly smoked—a black-eyed damsel, at service in Tynemouth, to light and cheer it, with ‘toddlin’ wee things’ in the distance—were the dreams he had indulged in, though but faintly of late—dreams that, as we talked and planned, assumed the colour of realities ; for the reward to him, if successful, would be large. I was not sorry that he had this additional incentive to exertion ; for the enterprise, I neither attempted to conceal from myself nor from him, was a perilous one.

It was at length determined that Davis should set off at once—not by coach, as that would by no means accord with the character of a distressed mariner, but on his ten toes—to Sidmouth, hang about there, and let it be well understood that he was in want of employment, and not particular to a shade of what kind, so it was a paying one. He was unknown to any of the crew of the Rose, and we agreed that he should remain so ; and that, in fact, no person whatever, except myself and Sir Joseph Yorke, was to know that he and I were in correspondence with each other. Tom started off in high spirits ; and a week afterwards, a large lugger-boat we had captured some time before—but now so entirely transmogrified by paint and fresh old sails, that her former owners could not have recognised her—was despatched in charge of four trusty men to a near point on the Dorset coast, with the ostensible object of fishing there. Ten more reliable seamen were sent off in five separate parties, and took up their abodes at various inland places within easy reach of each other, under strict orders to as much as possible avoid observation. This done, I started for London, booked myself by the Eclipse Devonshire coach as Lieutenant Robert—a compromise, by the way, between my unconquerable dislike to the assumption of a feigned name and the intimation of the desirableness of doing so, I had received at head-quarters—and was duly set down at the ‘Lord Exmouth’ roadside inn, about four miles out of Sidmouth on the London road.

Tom Davis had arrived some days before, and although he would not risk even a wink as I passed him, was, I soon found, getting on very well indeed. The manner in which our correspondence was carried on soon gave rise to a rumour, that I was engaged in a clandestine correspondence with a lady of the neighbourhood—an imputation, by the by, which did not in the slightest degree damage me with the fair folk of the inn and tiny neighbourhood. Davis received a number of folded sheets of paper—envelopes were unknown in those days—directed in my sister Jane’s handwriting to ‘Lieutenant Robert, Exmouth Inn, near Sidmouth,’ together with a small lady’s seal, bearing the motto, ‘Toujours à vous;’ words which I overheard one of the ushers at a neighbouring school render, at the instance of the curious barmaid, into, ‘All days to you!’ These sheets were filled up by Davis—who wrote a tolerable hand, though his spelling was somewhat Devonian—and slily posted in the night.

The memoranda with which I had been officially furnished, stated that one Silas Hartley, residing at Trafalgar Cottage, a few miles from Sidmouth, had exhibited great zeal in aid of the Preventive Service, although as yet attended by unsuccessful results only. One step especially, advised by him, had proved very unfortunate. Suspicion had been vaguely entertained by an officer of the Coast-Guard—how suggested it was not said—of Mr Denbigh, the occupier of Bauvale House, a handsome place about five miles east of Sidmouth, and something more than a mile and a half inland. These dim, and, as it proved, unfounded surmises, were strengthened by Silas Hartley's half-hints; and at last the officer was hastily awakened early in the morning by Silas, with the information, that a cargo of goods had been run just previously, and that he had himself seen the last loaded cart enter the court-yard of Bauvale House. This statement, corroborated by a country labourer, was fully credited: an entrance was forced, and the place ransacked from roof to cellar without the slightest article or evidence being found to palliate, much less to justify, the unwarrantable intrusion. The result was, that an action for compensation in damages had been brought by Mr Denbigh, and was now pending. Mr Denbigh was understood to be a person of large fortune, had qualified, or was about to qualify, as a county magistrate, and bore an excellent character in the neighbourhood. Still, Silas Hartley's good faith in the matter did not appear to be doubted, notwithstanding he had in this instance been so egregiously mistaken, and I had been directed to communicate with him. The conclusion I came to, after inquiry and examining the locality, was, that the injurious suspicion entertained of Mr Denbigh had its chief foundation in the evident adaptability of Bauvale House for a smuggler's dépôt. It has, I believe, been long since pulled down; but somewhere about thirty years ago, it stood amidst a thick wood, was certainly less than two miles inland, and led to from a long line of coast by half-a-dozen foot and cart-ruts, through a considerable extent of which even horsemen would be concealed by the high banks and the generally woody and uneven nature of the ground. And, after all, might not Silas Hartley be himself connected with the smuggling confederacy—employed to throw dust in the eyes of the preventive officers, and shield the real offenders, by diverting attention from them to innocent persons ! It struck me as very likely to be so, and with this impression strong in my mind, I called at Trafalgar Cottage about noon one day.

The door was suddenly opened—violently jerked back, as it were, upon its grating hinges—by a gaunt, herculean figure, with a strongly-marked countenance, flaming at the moment with a fierce and angry light, unequalled in its intensity by any painting I have ever seen. I stepped back, as if physically struck. Silas Hartley, for it was he, forcibly mollifying his rugged aspect, and with an attempt at a smile, mocked by his quivering, ashy lips and burning eyes, said quickly : ‘Don’t be alarmed, Lieutenant Warneford—Oh, I know you very well ! I am but just come in ; and we’—he jerked his head in the direction of a woman, young apparently, rocking herself to and fro in a wooden-seated chair, and with her face buried in her apron, sobbing violently—‘and we have been terribly put out by the refusal of a scoundrel to redeem’— ‘Father! father !’ screamed the female, dropping the apron from her face, and starting up with hands raised in a warning, imploring attitude. I now saw that she was young and comely. ‘Father !’

‘Ay, ay, girl ; I know, I understand. I was saying we had been disturbed, sir, by the refusal of a—a—well, hard words, to be sure, neither break bones nor butter parsnips —by the refusal of a person to redeem a—a debt solemnly promised to be discharged ; and you, Mr Warneford, caught us just in the flurry of it : that’s all.’

I had no difficulty, on involuntarily glancing round the apartment, to understand how keenly a delay of expected payment must be felt there. Still—

‘Poor, very poor, aint we ?’ fiercely broke out Silas Hartley, who had partially comprehended my look, and speaking with a kind of exultant bitterness. ‘Miserably poor ! Bare walls, rough floor, cold hearth, are to you signs of misery, wretchedness ! Ah ! young man, if you once knew what real misery’—

'To be sure, to be sure—right, girl,' rejoined Hartley, checking himself—'right: I am not quite mad yet.' There was silence for a minute or two; and then the strong-willed man, having thoroughly subdued himself, as far at least as outward appearance went, turned calmly towards me, handed a chair, seated himself, and said in bland tones, as startling by contrast as his previous fury: 'And now, Lieutenant Warneford, we will, if you please, talk about the smugglers.'

The scene I had just witnessed had so entirely capsized all my previous notions and suspicions of the man, and set me so completely adrift as to his position and purposes, that I listened with but slight attention or interest to his rambling talk. All that he said, I had heard or read before; and feeling that, for some motive or other, he was endeavouring, very clumsily—for his thoughts were not with his speech—to bamboozle me, I rose to leave, at the same moment that the young woman, with a modest courtesy, passed into an inner room. Hartley's back was towards me as he closed the door after her, and I said carelessly: 'I am going to call upon your great neighbour, Mr Denbigh, who'—

There was a fragment of looking-glass jammed between three nails on the wall in front of Hartley as he stood. As the word Denbigh passed my lips, he became instantly bolt upright, involuntarily or mechanically, as it were; and a section of the same face that had met me at the door, glared for a passing moment from the broken mirror. I stopped suddenly, but he did not look round, and presently stooped to tie one of his shoe-strings. By the time he turned towards me, his face was calm again. And here I may remark, that it had struck me several times, during his incoherent talk about smuggling, that his countenance, when fiercely quiet, so to speak, was that of a man condemned to death, or some other tremendous and inevitable penalty, undeserved, it might be, but certainly bitterly rebelled against.

'You are going to call on Squire Denbigh, are you?'

said he. ‘Well, a very nice man is Squire Denbigh.’ The deadliness of hate concentrated in the tone of these words could only be appreciated by the hearer of them.

‘No friend of yours, I perceive. Well, good-by. I wish you well.’

‘Good-day, sir,’ he replied, grasping my extended hand. ‘Nay, sir, excuse me; it is kind of you, and we are, it is true, poor; but this cannot be.’

‘You are a seaman, I see that plainly enough, and should not scruple at a trifling gift from one.’

‘True, I know the colour of blue water, but cannot for all that accept alms, even from you, Lieutenant Warneford.’

I said no more; the door gently closed behind me, and I went my way. I felt a good deal puzzled—discomfited would perhaps be the better word; for I had hoped for a very different result from the visit. There was evidently some mystery about the man, and I hated mysteries, especially such as appeared to foreshadow a sinister catastrophe, too many of which had already fallen in my way; and as Silas Hartley’s griefs could not be in any-wise connected with the special business I had in hand, I resolved to think no more, or, at all events, as little as possible, on the subject.

I found Mr Denbigh at home; and having sent in my name, I was at once admitted. Here, again, was a very different man from what I expected. Mr Denbigh was a shortish, sour, eager-eyed man of some fifty years of age, already stooping in his gait, and with no character in his face save that of remorseless greed and relentless cunning. He was seated in an apartment, half dining-room, half library, the furniture of which, though costly enough, appeared to have been taken hap-hazard from a furniture-store, so little did the articles harmonise with each other. My ostensible business was to solicit the favour of shooting over a portion of his property. This was readily granted; and indeed his liberality in such matters was the chief reason, I found, of his local popularity.

'There is also, Lieutenant Robert,' said Mr Denbigh, 'a fine trout-stream on the estate, in which you are very welcome to fish.'

'It is late in the year for trout-fishing,' I answered with some surprise.

'Ah, true! it may be,' rejoined Mr Denbigh, slightly colouring; 'but I do not much interest myself—not of late years, at least—in these things.'

Odd! thought I. Here is a country squire confoundedly out of his latitude in the country! I was, I perceived, painfully taxing his politeness, as the impatient fumbling of his fingers amongst a number of papers on the table before him plainly indicated; and I at once took leave. The door opened as I moved towards it, and a young man hastily entered with some papers in his hand. He was rather a good-looking person, save for a certain cowed, dejected expression, discernible at a glance.

'Will it be necessary, sir?'—he began.

'How dare you!' sternly, almost passionately interrupted Mr Denbigh—'how dare you intrude here unsummoned, especially when I am, as now, engaged!'

The young man looked very frightened, and I, bowing hurriedly, hastened out of the room and the house.

I had not been fortunate in either of my visits; and my temper, by the time I reached the 'Lord Exmouth,' was a good deal ruffled by a consciousness that I was making lee rather than headway in the business intrusted to me. Happily, Tom Davis, it was soon apparent, was sailing right before the wind to the desired haven. The rollicking humour of the man, his strong but always controllable love of alcoholic potations, his well-known poverty, together with his reputation as a first-rate seaman, had quickly pointed him out as likely to prove both an able and willing instrument in the hands of the contrabandists. Golding, one of their agents, sounded him on the matter; and Tom gradually yielded, with coy reluctance, to his seductive overtures; and overcome by the glittering bait, finally agreed to take service with Golding's employers, whoever they might be—a knowledge still carefully hidden from him. Tom subsequently informed me, that it was necessary something should be done to increase Golding's confidence in his stanchness, and that he was casting about for some means of effecting that essential purpose. A sudden thought and an uncalculated chance enabled him speedily to do so, and in a way, too, that took me for the moment thoroughly aback. I was strolling listlessly about in the vicinity of Bauvale House, when my eye lighted upon a group of three persons at a considerable distance, whom a nearer approach discovered to be Hartley, Davis, and Golding. They did not heed me till I was just passing them, and then Silas Hartley, slightly touching his hat, said: 'Good-day, Mr Robert.' 'Good-day,' I replied. Tom, who was unconcernedly turning away, stopped short, looked me hard in the face, as if to perfectly assure himself that he was right, and then said, with an iron impudence that almost lifted me off my feet: 'Mr Roberts, did you say? Why, this gentleman is Lieutenant Warneford, of His Majesty's Preventive Service.'

'Warneford!' exclaimed Golding. 'What! the commander of the Rose revenue-cutter!'

'The very identical fluke!' rejoined Tom, with the coolness of an iceberg. 'I have seen him at Portsmouth scores of times. He's come here, no doubt, to try and put salt upon some of our tails.'

The insolent merriment which followed this sally sent the hot blood to the very tips of my ears. 'You impudent rascal!' I began—'I have a mind to'—

'Easy, easy,' broke in Davis: 'that quarter-deck lingo is very well in its place, but it won't do here.'

The fellow's sneering laugh was again echoed by his companions, and then they, at his suggestion, walked away. They had not gone half-a-dozen yards, when Tom turned round, favoured me with a 'sight,' as it is termed—that is, he extended his outspread hands, joined at the thumbs, and projected from the tip of his nose towards me, under cover of which mocking gesture he contrived to squint me a look that instantly converted the angry astonishment I fell into gleeful admiration of Tom's quickness of resource and imperturbable cunning. Nothing could have been devised so likely to stamp Tom's trustworthiness in his employers' eyes ; whilst, as matters were turning, the further concealment of my real name was of the slightest possible importance. I was still laughing at Tom's device, when I was startled by a new and queer incident. Opening up by a rather sharp turn an avenue of the coppice, whom should I come suddenly upon but a pair of unfortunate lovers, as it appeared, passionately weeping and lamenting—the lady especially—in each other's arms ! A few words I unintentionally caught : ' He will not, cannot violate his promise this time ; be sure he will not, dear Mary,' said the gentleman.

' There is no trust—no faith to be placed in him ! ' sobbed the female. ' None '—

At this moment, they both caught sight of me, and I of them ; and great was my surprise to discover in them the young man I had seen at Bauvale House and Silas Hartley's daughter ! Simultaneously with me, a stout, thick-set man, whom I recognised as the servant that had opened the door of Mr Denbigh's mansion, appeared upon the scene. He was the first to speak : ' You have been missed, Mr Richard,' he said sternly and abruptly, ' and must instantly come in.'

' Yes—yes,' stammered the young man : the same terrified look that I had before observed darkening his countenance. ' I am coming.'

He imprinted two or three passionate kisses on the young woman's forehead, and then hurriedly followed his summoner. Mary Hartley also hastened quickly homewards, sobbing as she fleetly sped along.

So, thought I, the cause of the grief I witnessed at Trafalgar Cottage is a mere contrariety or mischance in love. I am glad of it ; for I feared it had a deeper, a more incurable source. The young man is doubtless a dependent relative of the gentleman he stands in such awe of, and the unequal match is very properly forbidden. Bah ! Time has a balm for all such sorrows.

The next day, I received a letter from Davis, stating that he was in high favour with Golding, and that a great stroke was contemplated, which would not, however, he thought, be ventured upon as long as I remained in the neighbourhood. This I had partly foreseen ; and I departed the same evening ostensibly for London, but really, as I advised Tom, for Poole, in Dorset. The second day after my arrival there, Davis wrote me that his hopes were verified, and that he and five others were about to set out immediately for St Malo, France, to assist in taking charge of two large boat-loads of costly goods. More than this, he did not at present know ; but he advised that, as postal communication was very slow between France and England, I should at once proceed in the luggar-boat to Jersey. He would direct his letter to the post-office there, and means could no doubt be thus contrived of intercepting and capturing the contrabandist expedition. I promptly adopted Tom's advice in its essentials. The boat was despatched to Jersey with four men only in her, who were to let it be surmised that they were brandy and tobacco purchasers. The rest of the seamen went, some from Plymouth, others from Southampton, with orders to be apparently unknown to each other, and in want of berths. I went singly from Weymouth. I had not the slightest doubt that our friends had agents in that island ; and the tidings that Lieutenant Warneford, with a powerful crew, was lurking about there, would no question have speedily reached St Malo, and capsized the entire plan. Hence these precautions.

I lodged at the Union Hotel in the Royal Square, under my assumed name of Robert, and exactly at the end of one slow dragging week, received the welcome signal from Davis. The boats, like our large luggers, were all prepared, and the precise time of departure determined on. One Tom commanded : they would, he said, touch at Guernsey, in order to take on board one Maitre Perchard, who, for some reason or other, did not trust himself in St Malo. This Perchard was, it seemed, a chief person in the confederacy ; but, as it was said, he had been frequently and lately in Devonshire and other parts of England on these expeditions, it would not be advisable that I should land at Guernsey, but quietly await them in the roads.

So far, so good ; still, there was a much more important object to be obtained than the mere capture of the two boats, valuable as the booty might be—namely, the discovery and conviction of the principals, and this, from Tom's letter, appeared to be as far off as ever. However, great progress had at all events been made ; and at early dawn I left St Helier's harbour with a light leading wind, and arrived in about five hours off Guernsey, all but four of us carefully concealed from observation.

About two o'clock we sighted the two boats, easily recognisable by Davis's description, and an hour afterwards they were lying-to off Guernsey, in wait for Maitre Perchard. He came on board without delay, and the voyage was continued, we leading at about a mile ahead without apparently incurring the slightest suspicion. The affair, as far as the two luggers went, was now as good as settled ; still, I determined, in order to avoid unnecessary blood-shedding, to defer the attack till night had fallen : indeed, but that such a continued hanging on by them would certainly have excited suspicion, I should have preferred waiting till they were close in with the Devonshire shore.

There was a light breeze, a gently-heaving swell, and just sufficient starlight to distinguish objects of any size three or four hundred yards off, when our boat, quietly helped by a couple of sweeps, stole gradually up in the wake of that I had seen Maitre Perchard go on board of. We were unnoticed for some time ; but at length I observed a bustle on board the smuggler, and I briefly bade the men be ready. A moment after, a tall, stout figure hailed us from the smuggler's stern-sheets, and angrily demanded if we knew where we were steering to ! I thought I knew the voice, but there was no time for a second thought on the matter. ‘ Give way, men ! ’ I shouted : half-a-dozen sweeps, as I spoke, dropped into the water ; in another minute, we were alongside our opponent; there was a wild tumult, a brief struggle, and the first beat was ours. The captives were hastily secured; and then returning with ten of the men to our own boat, we made after the other, which, having taken the alarm, was making off with sweep and sail. They had no chance in speed with us, and, thanks to Tom Davis's precaution, none in fight either. Half-a-dozen pistols, the charges of which had been carefully withdrawn, were snapped in our faces, the holders were knocked or thrown down, and the capture was complete. I shook hands heartily with Tom, and congratulated him on his coolness and success—a proceeding which of course elicited a roar of execration from the entrapped and defeated smugglers who witnessed it. The boats were now brought together, and prompted by recollection of the huge fellow's voice who hailed us, I took a lantern from one of the men, stepped to where Maitre Perchard was lying, threw the light upon his grim features, and, as I suspected, discovered that he was—Silas Hartley! I did not reply to the fierce scowl which sat upon his features. In about ten minutes, all the smugglers, save Hartley, were secured on board His Majesty's boat, under the charge of four seamen, and in another would have been on their way to Plymouth jail, when I was informed that Silas Hartley wished to have speech of me before the boat left with the prisoners.

‘What have you to say, Mr Hartley?’ I asked. He had become, I perceived, quite calm, and seemingly resigned.

‘This: I know what your chief aim is, and that without me it cannot be accomplished. Tom Davis, clever as he is, cannot help you.’

‘Be it so: what then?’

‘It will take some time for us to come to an understanding, and minutes are now precious. Do you first order that the long blue fur coats and glazed hats of four of the French prisoners be exchanged for the jackets and caps of four of your own crew. That done, get the boats under-way as quickly as possible.’

There could be no harm in complying with this intimation. I gave the necessary orders, and in a few minutes the prisoners were off, and we steering for Sidmouth.

Silas Hartley was unbound, I took the helm; he seated himself beside me, as he insisted on speaking in whispers only, out of earshot of the men.

'Davis knows nothing,' said he, 'of who are his employers, save Golding: I do. They are wealthy men, and Denbigh is their well-paid, confidential agent.'

'Ah! Then the story you told the officer was true?'

'Literally so; yes. There were thousands of pounds' worth of smuggled goods in Bauvale House when it was searched; but it was done to mislead of course.'

'Where or how could the goods have been hidden?'

'Very curiously. There is a deep round well in one of the cellars of the building, constructed no doubt when Bauvale House was a place of strength. It is now perfectly dry. The goods are thrown into it, a waterproof tub, exactly fitting the well, is then lowered down, filled with water; and no one suspects, after letting down an empty bucket and drawing it up full, that silks and laces are concealed beneath.'

'A famous contrivance, upon my word!'

'Yes; but you will not penetrate there with these goods, nor procure any evidence of Denbigh's and his confederates' complicity without my assistance. Till my voice is heard in the jargon agreed upon, the gates of his court-yard will not, depend upon it, be opened. He trusts no other, and that because I am hopelessly in the villain's power.'

'Hopelessly in his power! How then?—

'Hearken, Lieutenant Warneford, to a brief, sad tale, and then say if you will help me. You have noticed a young man of about twenty-five years of age at Bauvale House?'

'Yes; and I have also noticed that he is a lover of Mary Hartley.'

'A lover! yes, truly, in one sense they are lovers: they are brother and sister!'

'Brother and sister?'

'Yes. That young man is never permitted to be five minutes out of the sight of either Denbigh or one of his partners, Barnes, who usually acts as servant. The reason is this,' continued Silas Hartley, so hurriedly as scarcely to be intelligible: 'my son, Richard, was given up for a time to wild courses: he became acquainted with Denbigh, who, with others in London, is, or was, proprietor of a "hell" there. Richard was there entrapped, and ruined. I supplied him as long as I could. Finally, as they say, he forged upon Bingley to a considerable amount, and they have the fatal document still in their possession. It has made me their slave, and till within the last half-hour, there seemed no hope of escape from the dreadful bondage.—You do not answer!' he continued. 'It is well, perhaps, you should not, till all is told. The mad act was, I know, committed in a moment of intoxication, delirium—delirium purposely excited by Denbigh's agents. You know the penalty of forgery in this country, and must, I think, now understand me? Often, often has the callous villain promised me my son's deliverance as the reward of a successful run, and always refused to redeem his promise. He has sworn to do so if I succeed in this venture. He would, I doubt not, have violated that pledge also.—Still you do not speak! Look you, sir, we are not so poor as you may believe—nay, nay, I could not mean that: we have enough, I meant to say, had we but twelve hours' start, to reach America. You see how you may help us in this fearful strait. But twelve hours' start for him, not me: I care not for myself; and he, sir, is not, alas! technically, but really innocent as yourself of the deed, for he was insane, mad when he committed it!'

Silas Hartley's hand pressed my arm with a gripe of steel, and his flaming eyes shone into mine with terrible intensity. I did not speak for many seconds—indeed I could not. At last I rose, and placing the tiller in his hand, said: 'You, Mr Hartley, know our course best. Should I, by your means, succeed in unkennelling this nest of rascals, I do not see that I shall have any right to detain your son.'

The father's suspended breath burst forth almost in a scream as I ceased to speak, followed by a few brief, choking sobs. I went forward; and when I returned some minutes afterwards, his usual impassibility had returned, but there was a light in his eye I had never seen there before.

As we approached the coast, the usual signals were made, under Hartley's direction, and favourably answered by lights on the shore. A false alarm had, he told me, succeeded; and the preventive officers were on the look-out miles distant from the contemplated point of landing.

'Only four seamen, and they Frenchmen,' said Hartley as the decisive moment approached, 'will be allowed to enter Bauvale House with me. It is time, therefore, that you don these coats and hats.'

Tom Davis, I, and two seamen, did so; and nothing more was said, except a caution to the three men not to speak if questioned.

The run was completely successful. Four large carts were in attendance, the goods were speedily placed in them, and away we went, with the four carters—nine in all—towards Bauvale House. We halted within about 200 yards of the gate, where Hartley dismounted, went up, gave a peculiar whistle, and communicated with some one inside. The doors were immediately thrown open, and in we drove. The cellar opened on the court-yard, and the carts uptipped their loads into its mouth. We followed close upon Hartley's heels. The obscurity of the place, lighted only by two candles, one carried by Mr Denbigh, and the other by Barnes, greatly favoured us. The packages were tumbled into the well; the tub was lowered, twenty or thirty buckets of water were thrown in, and all was complete. Denbigh was all the time chuckling with delight. 'Shew these men into the kitchen, Maitre Perchard,' he said, as he and Barnes walked away. 'And let them have some refreshment. This is a capital night's work. And then do you come and receive their wages.'

We followed Hartley in the dark, holding by each other's coats, to the kitchen. He left us for a moment or so, and then returned with a candle. His face was white as paper, but lustrous with exultation and triumph. We put our shoes off at his whispered request, and followed stealthily his footsteps. He opened the dining-room door, passed in, but did not close it, and we could hear distinctly all that passed where we stood, just outside.

'There is the money,' said Denbigh's shrill voice, tossing at the same time, as we heard, a heavy purse on the table—'with an extra five sovereigns for yourself.'

'Yes, yes,' said Hartley; 'but my son's release, so often solemnly promised me'—

'For God's sake, gentlemen, do not deceive us this time!' said the meek, subdued voice of the son. 'You know well that in intention I was innocent as a child.'

A brutal laugh was the answer. 'Innocent here, innocent there,' mocked the savage tones of Barnes, 'has nothing to do with it. We cannot part with you yet awhile.'

An exulting shout burst irrepressibly from the excited father. 'Hear the accursed traitors! Hear them, Lieutenant Warneford!—hear them, Davis!—hear them, my friends! They cannot part with him yet awhile—ha! ha! ha!'

The suddenness of this unexpected stroke was terrible, and Denbigh and Barnes looked more, as we entered, like startled ghosts than living beings. The men instantly, at a gesture from me, proceeded to secure and bind them. I looked hard at Silas Hartley: he comprehended my meaning, whispered hastily to his son, who instantly hurried out of the room. This broke Denbigh's trance of terror. 'Stop that man, Lieutenant Warneford!' he screamed. 'Arrest him: he is a felon!'

'What man?'

'He who has just run off—Richard Hartley. He is a felon—a forger, I tell you, and I can prove it!'

' Possibly ; but I have no authority to detain felons. You can prefer the charge hereafter.'

' But in the meantime he will escape ! ' shouted the miserably vindictive man, and then stamped and howled with baffled rage. There was, however, no help for it. The two prisoners were secured in the house for the night, and late the following evening, lodged in Exeter jail. A formidable conspiracy was effectually broken up, and enormous penalties were liquidated, out of court, by parties against whom legal proofs of complicity were obtained.

The Hartleys, both father and son—for Silas quietly slipped off unnoticed in the confusion—did escape to the United States. I often heard of them as thriving there. In 1840, the sister, then a Mrs Boydon, informed me of her father's death, since which I have received no tidings concerning them. I made a clean breast of the whole matter to the authorities, and can at least very confidently say, that the course I had taken with respect to young Hartley was not disapproved of. Tom Davis, I must not omit to state, has still got his fishing-vessel, his cottage, his houri, much plumper than she was thirty years ago—and lots of bairns, three of whom are taller, but not, I think, better or braver men than their father.

ADVENTURE ON THE ST LAWRENCE.

THE following narrative of a remarkable adventure on the St Lawrence, appeared a number of years ago in a Liverpool newspaper, where it was vouched for as true in every particular :—

' On the 22d of April 1810, our party set sail in a large schooner from Fort George, or Niagara Town, in Upper Canada, and in two days crossed Lake Ontario to Kingston, at the head of the river St Lawrence, distant from Niagara about 200 miles. Here we hired an American barge—a large flat-bottomed boat—to carry us to Montreal, a further distance of 200 miles: then set out from Kingston on the 28th of April, and arrived the same evening at Osdenburgh, a distance of 75 miles. The following evening we arrived at Cornwall; and the succeeding night, at Pointe du Lac, on Lake St Francis: here our bargemen obtained our permission to return up the river: and we embarked in another barge, deeply laden with potashes, passengers, and luggage. Above Montreal, for nearly 100 miles, the river St Lawrence is interrupted in its course by rapids, which are occasioned by the river being confined within comparatively narrow, shallow, rocky channels: through these it rushes with great force and noise, and is agitated like the ocean in a storm. Many people prefer these rapids, for grandeur of appearance, to the Falls of Niagara: they are from half a mile to nine miles long each, and require regular pilots. On the 30th of April, we arrived at the village of the Cedars; immediately below which are three sets of very dangerous rapids—the Cedars, the Split-Rock, and the Cascades—distant from each other about one mile. On the morning of the 1st of May, we set out from the Cedars; the barge very deep and very leaky; the captain, a daring, rash man, refused to take a pilot. After we passed the Cedar Rapid, not without danger, the captain called for some rum, swearing at the same time with horrid impiety that all the powers could not steer the barge better than he did. Soon after this, we entered the Split-Rock Rapids by a wrong channel, and found ourselves advancing rapidly towards a dreadful watery precipice, down which we went. The barge slightly grazed her bottom against the rock, and the fall was so great as nearly to take away the breath. We here took in a great deal of water, which was mostly baled out again before we hurried on to what the Canadians call the grand bouillie, or great boiling. In approaching this place, the captain let go the helm, saying: "Now for it! here we fill!" The barge was almost immediately overwhelmed in the midst of immense foaming breakers, which rushed over the bows, carrying away planks, oars, &c. About half a minute elapsed between the filling and going down of the barge, during which I had sufficient presence of mind to strip off my three coats, and was loosening my suspenders, when the barge sank, and I found myself floating in the midst of people, baggage, &c. Each man caught hold of something; one of the crew caught hold of me, and kept me down under water; but, contrary to my expectations, let me go again. On rising to the surface, I got hold of a trunk, on which two other men were then holding. Just at this spot where the Split-Rock Rapids terminate, the bank of the river is well inhabited, and we could see women on shore, running about, much agitated. A canoe put off, and picked up three of our number, who had gained the bottom of the barge, which had upset and got rid of its cargo: these they landed on an island. The canoe put off again, and was approaching near to where I was, with two others, holding on by the trunk; when, terrified with the vicinity of the Cascades, to which we were approaching, it put back, notwithstanding my exhortations in French and English, to induce the two men on board to advance. The bad hold which one man had of the trunk to which we were adhering, subjected him to constant immersion; and in order to escape his seizing hold of me, I let go the trunk, and in conjunction with another man, got hold of the boom—which, with the gaff, sails, &c. had been detached from the mast, to make room for the cargo—and floated off. I had just time to grasp this boom, when we were hurried into the Cascades: in these I was instantly buried, and nearly suffocated. On rising to the surface, I found one of my hands still on the boom, and my companion also adhering to the gaff. Shortly after descending the Cascades, I perceived the barge, bottom upwards, floating near me. I succeeded in getting to it, and held by a crack in one end of it: the violence of the water, and the falling out of the casks of ashes, had quite wrecked it. For a long time, I contented myself with this hold, not daring to endeavour to get upon the bottom, which I at length effected; and from this, my new situation, I called out to my companion, who still preserved his hold of the gaff. He shook his head; and when the waves suffered me to look up again, he was gone. He made no attempt to come near me, being unable or unwilling to let go his hold, and trust himself to the waves, which were then rolling over his head.

'The Cascades are a kind of fall or rapid descent in the river, over a rocky channel below: going down is called by the French sauter—to leap or shove the Cascades. For two miles below, the channel continues in uproar, just like a storm at sea; and I was frequently nearly washed off the barge by the waves which rolled over it. I now entertained no hope whatever of escaping; and although I continued to exert myself to hold on, such was the state to which I was reduced by cold, that I wished only for speedy death, and frequently thought of giving up the contest as useless. I felt as if compressed into the size of a monkey; my hands appeared diminished in size one-half; and I certainly should—after I became very cold and much exhausted—have fallen asleep, but for the waves that were passing over me, which obliged me to attend to my situation. I had never descended the St Lawrence before; but I knew there were more rapids ahead—perhaps another set of the Cascades—but, at all events, the La Chine Rapids, whose situation I did not exactly know. I was in hourly expectation of these putting an end to me, and often fancied some points of ice, extending from the shore, to be the head of foaming rapids. At one of the moments in which the succession of waves permitted me to look up, I saw, at a distance, a canoe, with four men, coming towards me, and waited in confidence to hear the sound of their paddles; but in this I was disappointed: the men, as I afterwards learned, were Indians—genuine descendants of the Tatars—who, happening to fall in with one of the passengers' trunks, picked it up, and returned to the shore for the purpose of pillaging it, leaving, as they since acknowledged, the man on the boat to his fate. Indeed, I am certain I should have had more to fear from their avarice than to hope from their humanity; and it is more than probable that my life would have been taken, to secure them in the possession of my watch and several half-eagles which I had about me. The accident happened at eight o'clock in the morning; in the course of some hours, as the day advanced, the sun grew warmer, the wind blew from the south, and the water became calmer. I got upon my knees, and found myself in the small lake St Louis, about three to five miles wide: with some difficulty, I got upon my feet, but was soon convinced, by cramps and spasms in all my sinews, that I was quite incapable of swimming any distance, and I was then two miles from the shore. I was now going, with wind and current, to destruction; and cold, hungry, and fatigued, was obliged again to sit down in the water to rest, when an extraordinary circumstance greatly relieved me. On examining the wreck, to see if it were possible to detach any part of it to steer by, I perceived something loose, entangled in a fork of the wreck, and so carried along: this I found to be a small trunk, bottom upwards, which, with some difficulty, I dragged up upon the barge. After near an hour's work, in which I broke my penknife, whilst trying to cut out the lock, I made a hole in the top, and, to my great satisfaction, drew out a bottle of rum, a cold tongue, some cheese, and a bag full of bread, cakes, &c. all wet. Of these I made a seasonable, though very moderate use; and the trunk answered the purpose of a chair to sit upon, elevated above the surface of the water.

'After in vain endeavouring to steer the wreck, or direct its course to the shore, and having made every signal—with my waistcoat, &c.—in my power, to the several headlands which I had passed, I fancied I was driving into a bay, which, however, soon proved to be the termination of the lake, and the opening of the river, the current of which was carrying me rapidly along. I passed several small uninhabited islands; but the banks of the river appearing to be covered with houses, I again renewed my signals, with my waistcoat and a shirt, which I took out of the trunk, hoping, as the river narrowed, they might be perceived. The distance was too great. The velocity with which I was going convinced me of my near approach to the dreadful rapids of La Chine. Night was drawing on; my destruction appeared certain, but did not disturb me very much: the idea of death had lost its novelty, and had become quite familiar. I really felt more provoked at having escaped so long to be finally sacrificed, than alarmed at the prospect. Finding signals in vain, I now set up a cry or howl, such as I thought best calculated to carry to a distance, and, being favoured by the wind, it did, although at above a mile distant, reach the ears of some people on shore. At last I perceived a boat rowing towards me, which, being very small and white-bottomed, I had for some time taken for a fowl with a white breast; and I was taken off the barge by Captain Johnstone, after being ten hours on the water. I found myself at the village of La Chine, twenty-one miles below where the accident happened, having been driven by the winding of the current a much greater distance. I received no other injury than bruised knees and breast, with a slight cold. The accident took some hold of my imagination, and for seven or eight succeeding nights, in my dreams, I was engaged in the dangers of the Cascades, and surrounded by drowning men, &c. My escape was owing to a concurrence of fortunate circumstances. I happened to catch hold of various articles of support, and to exchange each article for another just at the right time. Nothing but the boom could have carried me down the Cascades without injury, and nothing but the barge could have saved me below them. I was also fortunate in having the whole day: had the accident happened one hour later, I should have arrived opposite the village of La Chine after dark, and, of course, would have been destroyed in the rapids below, to which I was rapidly advancing. The trunk which furnished me with provisions and a resting-place above the water, I have every reason to think was necessary to save my life; without it, I must have passed the whole time in the water, and have been exhausted with cold and hunger. When the people on shore saw our boat take the wrong channel, they predicted our destruction: the floating luggage, by supporting us for a time, enabled them to make an exertion to save us; but as it was not supposed possible to survive the passage of the Cascades, no further exertions were thought of, nor, indeed, could they well have been made.

‘It was at this very place that General Ambert’s brigade of 300 men, coming to attack Canada, was lost: the French at Montreal received the first intelligence of the invasion, by the dead bodies floating past the town. The pilot who conducted their first bateau, committing — it is said intentionally — the same error that we did, ran for the wrong channel, and the other bateaux following close, all were involved in the same destruction. The whole party with which I was, escaped: four left the barge at the Cedar village above the rapids, and went to Montreal by land; two more were saved by the canoe; the barge’s crew, all accustomed to labour, were lost; of the eight men who passed down the Cascades, none but myself escaped, or were seen again; nor, indeed, was it possible for any one, without my extraordinary luck, and the aid of the barge, to which they must have been very close, to have escaped; the other men must have been drowned immediately on entering the Cascades. The trunks, &c. to which they adhered, and the heavy greatcoats which they had on, very probably helped to overwhelm them; but they must have gone at all events: swimming in such a current of broken stormy waves was impossible; still, I think my knowing how to swim, kept me more collected, and rendered me more willing to part with one article of support to gain a better: those who could not swim would naturally cling to whatever hold they first got; and, of course, many had very bad ones. The captain passed me above the Cascades on a sack of woollen clothes, which were doubtless soon saturated and sunk.’

A N E A S T I N D I A N S T O R Y.

ABOUT two years before my arrival at Bombay, a Lieutenant Bellarmine had disappeared in a mysterious way, which left it uncertain whether he had fallen in a skirmish with a body of Pindarees, or if, as was reported on some unascertained authority, he had joined these wild depredators, and remained willingly in some of their fastnesses. His previous habits gave a sort of colour to this strange story, for he was known to be a rash, thoughtless lad, distinguished for his bravery, but continually involved in all sorts of quarrels and debt. He was on this account out of favour with most of the superior officers, but was, notwithstanding, a good deal liked in society, from the frank, generous tone of his conversation, and a certain rattling, agreeable merriment, which used to thaw the stiffness of Bombay hospitality into involuntary good-humour. To these qualities he probably owed his union with a very amiable woman, whom his irregularities and ultimate disappearance left at the presidency in a state little short of distraction. His own fate only gave rise to wonder and curiosity, but that of his wife excited universal commiseration. Had there been authentic accounts of the death of her husband, her situation would have been much less distressing ; for she could then have embarked at once for England, where, though her friends were poor (as was reported), her allowance as an officer's widow would at least have placed her above want. In her present situation, she was pitied and respected by every one. No aid that she could have wished for was awanting, but she uniformly declined every attention, except that of one or two friends—relations, it was understood, of her husband. It was at the residence of one of these gentlemen that I first saw her.

During the dry season, the English inhabitants of Bombay generally quit their houses within the confined walls and streets of the town, and betake themselves to temporary residences erected on a small green plain between the fortification and the sea. Some of these annual edifices are spacious erections, with a court-yard, stables, kitchen, huts for servants, &c. all constructed of poles and the woody reeds of the country ; the dwelling-places being made tight by a coat of clay-plaster. Another set of residences consist of large tents, which are generally occupied by gentlemen of the military service, and whose clean, white appearance, as they stand scattered over the green, with the black servants moving about among them, and the horses, or sometimes a camel, picketed in front, give peculiar animation to the scene. It is best enjoyed from the opposite rising-ground on the Bombay esplanade, where the sea in the distance, and the background of the little island of Colabba, studded with palm-trees, are added to the picture. I had been out one evening with a military friend, of the name of Malloch, on this walk, and had lingered till long after sunset, enjoying the coolness of the sea-breeze. The tents still glittered white in the starlight, and we were sauntering along slowly, sometimes stopping to mark the figures that were in motion about the little camp, and once or twice to gaze on a group or two of dancers in front of some of the tents. One party who seemed to enjoy the exercise with much animation had two flute-players, whose music gave them an additional attraction. The scene altogether was uncommonly pleasing ; but Malloch, whose attention was fixed entirely on the music and dancing, after gazing till his enthusiasm was kindled, suddenly called out : ‘ It is Eastlake’s tent, I declare : let us join them. There is a lady there just now whom I have long wished to see.’

‘ We may go, I daresay,’ said I, knowing how difficult it would be to keep back my impetuous companion, and aware that we could meet with nothing but the kindest reception from my gallant friend and his hospitable lady.

We accordingly paced downwards across the esplanade, and, leaping the rail by which it is surrounded, soon found ourselves approaching the dancers. The vivacity of the scene was greatly heightened, as we drew near and could distinguish the appearance and even the voices of some of the party ; but I began at the same time to feel the awkwardness of intrusion, and wished I had been less ready in yielding to my flighty companion. Just in time to save us from embarrassment, we met my friend Major Eastlake, who had himself come out so far from the tent in order to enjoy the scene at a little distance. He immediately invited us to join the party ; and as we accompanied him thither, he mentioned that he had received directions to take the command of a detachment ordered to embark in a day or two for Ahmednuggur, and that some of his friends had come to bid him adieu on that occasion.

When we joined the company, each of us found several acquaintances ; and Malloch was very soon engaged with the dancing and music, being himself an admirable performer on the flute. After some time, he began to look round for a partner ; and passing by the ladies who were nearest, he went to address himself to one who sat by herself—with some appearance of being neglected—in a corner of the veranda. I observed that his first motion towards her was noticed by Major Eastlake with a kind of displeased surprise, and that he made a step, as if to arrest my companion's intention : he was, however, too late ; Malloch, with his usual impetuosity, having already approached and requested the honour of her hand. The lady only replied by a slight shake of her head, and a motion of dissent. At the same moment, Major Eastlake came up, and said to her, with a peculiar manner, which Malloch ought certainly to have felt as a rebuke : ‘This is my friend, Mr Malloch, madam : Mrs Bellarmine does not dance, Mr Malloch.’ Malloch, who of course knew the history of the young lady, seemed hurt at his own forwardness, and answered by a respectful bow, begging pardon for his intrusion, but hoping that Mrs Bellarmine would not be offended. The lady only answered by a very slight inclination of her head, and a melancholy smile, while Major Eastlake listened to every word with obvious impatience. Malloch was at length led away, and immediately came to the seat next mine.

'What a lovely creature!' he said: 'she is more beautiful than ever.'

'More beautiful than ever!' I replied: 'you have seen Mrs Bellarmine before, then?'

'Years ago,' answered he. 'I saw her before she had any thoughts of coming to India, or being left in this deserted state, by the fool whom she married. I wish you could be introduced to her.'

'Not if it were to drive me mad, as it appears to have done you, Malloch,' I said. 'You should have respected her seclusion from the company; and I hope you will recollect how highly she is regarded by Major Eastlake and his lady.'

'Oh, she does not need their recommendation to me: but I am acquainted with Mrs Eastlake: the major is a stiff old boy, but he is going in a day or two, and I shall then have a better introduction than his.'

As he was speaking, I observed Major Eastlake's attention directed towards me, and a slight motion intimated his wish that I would make my way to him. I was soon by his side; and after a few words on indifferent matters, he said: 'I notice that your acquaintance is inclined to direct his attention towards our poor friend Mrs Bellarmine. I know that anything of that kind—particularly from a volatile person like Malloch—is disagreeable and inconvenient to her; and I therefore take the liberty of imposing on you the task of guardian, which no one else can undertake so well without the risk of offending your friend, or of being officious to Mrs Bellarmine.' I bowed, as to one whose good opinion I highly valued, and he immediately turned and introduced me to the lady. She looked up, and I think I never beheld a face of more engaging loveliness: she was dark-haired and dark-eyed, with something of the usual paleness of English ladies who have resided a few years in India; but her complexion had a purity and brightness which I have seldom seen equalled ; and her fine regular features, though marked with settled melancholy, responded with quiet intelligence to everything she deigned to notice in conversation. I entered into discourse with her for a few minutes, and found her a remarkable exception to most of our Oriental dames, who are generally brimming over with all manner of gossip about matters of precedence at balls, scandal at private parties, the debts and embarrassments of acquaintances, and all the other knick-knackeries of their limited society. She either did not know, or did not speak of these matters ; and I was thrown upon literary conversation, in order to say something. She answered here with intelligence ; and I soon found that she lived in a secluded land of poetry and imagination, which is but little trod by Oriental ladies. Her sorrow and retirement had blunted her relish for society, but had not destroyed her mind. All her tastes, however, seemed of a serious character : Cowper, Beattie, Graham, and Montgomery, supplied her with the richest, and most beautiful allusions ; but of the fierce, mistrustful, and irregular Byron, she did not seem to recognise a line. The readiness with which she appreciated my remarks, and the overflowing yet delicately selected stores of her own memory, made me no longer wonder at the deference with which she was regarded by the few friends to whom she allowed herself to be known.

As we were departing, Major Eastlake said to me : ' You will not now wonder at the interest we take in Mrs Bellarmine. Her situation is rendered more painful by the conflicting rumours which are continually brought concerning her husband, to whom she is sincerely and devotedly attached ; for, notwithstanding his follies, he knew and respected her value. Her distress, I really believe, arises chiefly from the imputations which have been cast on his honour. For myself, I give no credit to them. I know that poor Henry was rash and imprudent ; but he was a soldier-like spirit, and could never have turned renegade. My new situation will soon give me the power of making effectual inquiries concerning his fate. If he is alive, I shall certainly find means to reach him ; and if he has fallen honourably, it shall be ascertained. In the meantime, I beg again to repeat my charge, for I have heard and seen enough of Mr Malloch to fear that he is capable of causing uneasiness.' He took leave of me with these words, and I did not see him again before he embarked.

His precautions, however, rather accelerated what he feared. Malloch was piqued at the notice bestowed upon me ; and he had not boasted in vain of his acquaintance with Mrs Eastlake, who by no means took the same interest in the fate of Lieutenant Bellarmine as did her husband the major ; and firmly believing him to be dead, she had even great pleasure in the prospect of managing a new match for his widow. Malloch had even the art to render my visits somewhat less acceptable to this lady than they were wont, so that I had but few opportunities of learning what was going on. Once or twice when I called, Mrs Bellarmine spoke to me with feelings of the deepest regard concerning her husband, without seeming once to have had her confidence in him shaken ; and she mentioned, that if Major Eastlake ascertained anything concerning him, he would write first to me on the subject. I alluded once to the circumstance which Malloch had mentioned—that he had met her in England. ' Captain Malloch is Mrs Eastlake's guest here,' she said, ' and I can do nothing that is rude to him ; but at no period, either in England or in India, have I seen reason to consider him a man of delicacy or honour.' She said no more, and the subject was not again alluded to.

One day, when I had called at the house, something led me into the garden, and I was assisting the malee (native gardener) to train up some Oriental jessamine on the end wall of a back veranda. Mrs Bellarmine had entered this part of the house in the meanwhile, and Captain Malloch, who had also arrived, joined her there. All this I gathered from conjecture ; but being separated from them only by a slight partition, not in very good repair, I was apprised of their presence by the sound of well-known voices. I could not escape from hearing the following fragments of their conversation :—

‘ My dear Mrs Bellarmine, how often have I repeated, that your image has never once been absent from my mind since I first saw you at Greenside ! ’

‘ I was then a governess in the family of your relation, Mr Malloch ; and your attentions were at that time neither more agreeable nor more honourable to me than they are now. I beg you may desist from language to which I dare not, and will not listen.’

‘ Dare not ! How often have I told you that Bellarmine will never return ? He was a man I never esteemed, were it for nothing but his conduct to you ; but I must say that he died as a soldier should.’

‘ How have you obtained this information, Mr Malloch ? ’

‘ I know more about Bellarmine than you suppose. I was in the same district with him at the time of the skirmish where he fell ; and it was a foolish joke of mine —though it was never known—that gave rise to the absurd rumour about his having joined the enemy.’

‘ Good God ! ’ exclaimed Mrs Bellarmine ; and then, suddenly restraining herself, she said : ‘ perhaps your present story is a joke also ? ’

‘ My dear Mrs Bellarmine, if you doubt my word, look at that letter which I have received from a sergeant who was on the field with him.’

There was silence for a few minutes, only that I heard a deep sigh from the female speaker, and, in a moment after, a shriek, and then a sound, as if some one had fallen down.

I hurried round to the front door, but before I could gain admission, there was a crowd of servants collected in the veranda, and Mrs Eastlake was busy chafing the temples of her friend, who lay in a swoon. Captain Malloch was standing at the opposite end of the veranda, leaning against one of its pillars, and gazing with a strange and gloomy earnestness at the scene before him. I saluted him with a manner in which, I fancy, he must have seen something of my present feelings, for his return was distant and haughty. It was now verging to night, and Mrs Bellarmine was removed into an inner room, where there were lights. Malloch and I were left together, but no conversation passed; and in a short time a message was brought to us, that the lady was better. I proceeded to the apartment where she was; Captain Malloch, as I observed, lingering behind, and not appearing resolved what to do.

Just as I was departing, one of my servants who had followed me thither came up, and put into my hand a letter which a peon (runner) had brought to my house. I took it, and went into the room where the two ladies were sitting. Mrs Bellarmine was pale, but collected, and said that she was quite recovered. Her attention seemed attracted by the unopened letter which I held in my hand; and on looking at it myself, I perceived that it was in the handwriting of Major Eastlake. It would not be easy to describe the anxiety which the whole party now felt as to its contents: to Mrs Bellarmine's agitated mind, they seemed to hold the cup of life or death. I broke the seal. The letter was short, but full of interest:—

‘MY DEAR SIR—I am glad to say that I have obtained sure intelligence concerning our poor friend Henry: his honour is as untainted as the snow. He was made prisoner by the Pindarees, and is now confined in one of their hill-forts, where I have found means of communicating with him. I cannot as yet attempt his release, but he shall be restored to us. You may have heard that Malloch had a command in this district at the time of the skirmish; and it now appears that it was owing to some treachery or cowardice on his part that Henry’s party was entrapped and surrounded by the banditti. These things will now be brought to light, as well as some mean forgeries which have been attempted of late, and of which a sergeant here has given an account. I am,’ &c.

I had read so far before perceiving that Malloch had by this time followed me into the room, and had heard part of the letter : at the last words, I was alarmed by seeing him at once dart out of the apartment with a look of distraction. I heard his footsteps running across the garden, but remained in a kind of mute astonishment, both at the suddenness of his action, and at the contents of the letter. I had hardly stood a minute in this state, when Bappoo, one of the servants, came running into the apartment with a look of terror, and cried : ' Sahib ! Sahib ! Mr Malloch has thrown himself into the sea ! ' The house where Mrs Eastlake lived — she had now removed into the town — was just within the ramparts, on that side where they run into the bay ; and a leap from the parapet-wall at high-water was certain death, except to the best swimmers. If the dreadful announcement was correct, there was, in the present darkness, no chance of recovering Malloch.

I rushed, however, to the spot which the man had pointed out ; and as soon as I got on the wall, I sprang to the top of the parapet to look down. The waters were tossing and weltering against the bottom of the fortifications, where I could distinguish nothing in the darkness but the indistinct heaving of a stormy sea, and the white foam which broke in white patches on the tops of its endless waves. To think that a fellow-creature was struggling in such an abyss, perhaps within reach of my aid — if his pride or remorse would allow him to call for it — was dreadful. As we were standing gazing in this anxiety, I heard one of the natives present — for several had now assembled — say to another, in his native tongue : ' I see the fool sitting on a stone ! ' My eye lighted at the moment on the object he had observed, which was certainly something white — the colour of the military undress worn by Malloch — and having the appearance of a human figure seated on a rock ; but whether it was this, or merely an illusion caused by the foam which broke there, the darkness rendered it difficult to say. I called, however, for a ladder, with the intention of descending ; and while the men were fetching it, I could not but picture to myself the extraordinarstate of Malloch's thoughts — if it were he — which thus kept him fixed on a rock in an agony between suicide and the terror of dying — the ridicule of surviving, and the disgrace of such a death. At this moment, we were joined by another person, who had been approaching along the ramparts. He was a tall, soldierly-looking man, in a dark military greatcoat, and was followed by a black servant. I was not aware of his presence, till informed by a kind of whispered intimation from an attendant. As soon as the stranger saw that he was observed, he asked what was the matter. I mentioned that a gentleman had thrown himself from the parapet, and pointed to the figure which we saw.

'Why does not some one go down to him?' he asked.

'A ladder will be brought directly,' I answered.

'A ladder! it will never do to wait for that. Mohammed, give me your turban; or tie your turban and girdle together, and give me the end of them.'

A rope was soon made of the long turbans and girdles of the natives, which was held fast by these people; while the stranger, throwing off his greatcoat, slid down the wall, and dashed into the sea. We lost sight of him instantly in the tumult of waves and the darkness, and could not tell what was to be the event. In the meantime, I inquired at the servant who his master was?

'It is Mr Bellarmine, sir—arrived from Chunder.'

I had not time to recover from the astonishment caused by this stunning intimation, when I saw him emerge from the water on the little rock; and two figures were immediately seen standing together, and, after a little time, apparently struggling with each other. This, in other circumstances, was only what was to be expected, as Malloch, in his frenzy, might refuse to be saved; but if they should recognise each other in such a situation, what would be the event? The ladder had been now brought; so that, taking a rope in one hand, I hurried down the wall, and swam to the spot so often mentioned. As I approached, the water shallowed a little, and I could stand upon my feet, in which situation I could hear and see what passed. Bellarmine was endeavouring to persuade Malloch to be saved ; while the latter only answered by furious imprecations and oaths ; at times saying : ‘ Is it the dead come alive ?—or what are you ? I am mad—mad—mad—to meet Bellarmine swimming about in the sea ! Get you gone, sir—I never hurt you. It is false—false.’ Bellarmine, who did not appear to recognise him, continued struggling to drag him towards the landing-place ; and in the meantime I came up, and got the rope fastened round his waist and shoulders. With the assistance of the men pulling on the top of the parapet, we now guided him through the water ; and though it looks a little grotesque, had him dragged up the wall like a bundle of wet rags. I prevailed on Bellarmine to ascend before me, and we were both safe landed in a few minutes. Malloch was lying on the grass of the ramparts, and seemed to all appearance either dead or in a swoon.

‘ Who is he ? and what has caused this ? ’ asked Mr Bellarmine.

Before I could get time to answer, a sergeant’s wife, who attended as a nurse in Major Eastlake’s family, interposed : ‘ Oh, it is Captain Malloch, sir ; and he drowned himself, because he was jilted by that creature Mrs Bellarmine. I hope she may get a worse yet, now that her thriftless husband is dead, as Captain Malloch told me himself.’

The astonishment of Bellarmine at this abrupt intelligence cannot be conceived. He looked at me for explanation, which I gave him with the more awkwardness, that I had felt Malloch’s pulse in the meantime, and perceived that he was only feigning insensibility, in order to escape being questioned. His odd situation may be conceived, in being thus tied down to hear the account which I had to give Bellarmine of his conduct.

The meeting which immediately took place between the long-lost Bellarmine and his wife cannot be described. This amiable and ill-used lady, in now recovering her beloved husband, felt herself fully rewarded for her constancy and affection. On an explanation being made by Bellarmino, it appeared he was the bearer of documents which freed him from every shadow of blame. He was also able, in consequence of information which he had collected during his imprisonment among the Pindarees, to render services to government, which led to his speedy promotion. As for the wretched Malloch, the designer of so much evil, and whose infamous schemes had, in reality, proved ultimately beneficial to his victim, he was shunned by all who knew him; and shortly after, obtaining leave of absence, he departed to Europe, there to hide his shame, and to escape the ridicule of his various misadventures.

THE KNIGHTS OF MALTA.

THE institution of the Knights of Malta was one of greater importance and utility in its day than is generally imagined. However slight may be the merit accruing from the Crusades for the recovery of the Holy Land, they are entitled to share in it largely; but they have higher claims, of a much later date, upon the gratitude of the Christian world. Almost by the unaided exertions of this band of brothers, the Ottoman power was held in check, and its extension materially impeded, on the eastern coasts of Europe. This was a great service to the whole of that continent. The knights of Malta effected, on the bosom of the Mediterranean, what John Sobieski effected on the plains of Austria; and their names should be embalmed along with his in the memory of Christendom.

Towards the middle of the eleventh century, when the Holy Land was entirely in the power of the Mohammedans, the Egyptian caliph, Monstaser-Billah, was induced to permit the erection of a Christian chapel in the city of Jerusalem, with two hospitals, one of them dedicated to St John the Almoner. These were intended for the relief of the numerous pilgrims who then visited Palestine from all Christian countries. After Godfrey of Bouillon conquered the Holy City in 1099, the Hospital of St John became a place of great note as an establishment for healing the wounded and the sick, and was converted by Gerard, its rector, from a secular to a religious institution. He, with his brothers and sisters of charity, formally abjured the world, and assumed as their dress a black gown, having on the left breast a white cross. At the same time, a number of illustrious crusaders, burning with pious zeal, entered the body; and Godfrey of Bouillon endowed it with lands in Brabant. His example was speedily followed by other princes and barons of Europe, until the order grew wealthy, and founded many new houses both in Asia and Europe. The next step was the conjunction of the military with the religious character. Raymond du Puis succeeded to the rectorship; and having been a brave soldier in his day, he was induced by the reiterated attacks made on the Christians at their first settlement in the East, to propose to his companions—most of them old soldiers like himself—to join the profession of arms to their other duties. The summons sounded like a trumpet in the ears of the veterans, and Raymond du Puis became the first Grand-master of the Order of the Knights-Hospitallers of St John. Three classes were established in the order—that of the Knights, who were required, at first at least, to prove a noble extraction; that of Chaplains, who were non-military; and that of Half-Knights, or Serving-Brothers, who were not of high birth, and whose duties lay both in the hospital and the field. The establishment of commanderies, as the houses were called, in different countries, rendered it proper to establish divisions called Languages in the order—as one for England, one for Germany, and so on. These were at first seven, and finally nine in number. Noble youths from all Europe soon swelled the order of the Hospitallers into a numerous force, and one of great strength, in times when a single mounted knight, cased in armour, was a match for half-a-dozen of the ordinary soldiery. Their wealth also enabled them to hire large bodies of mercenaries to aid in their enterprises ; and their European houses, or commanderies, served as dépôts, whence auxiliaries were continually drafted to the wars.

This formidable body remained in Palestine during the entire period of its occupation, complete or partial, by the Latin Christians, witnessing the whole of the nine crusades, rendered necessary by the inveterate determination of the Mohammedans to recover their lost possessions. During all this time, they existed but to fight, having scarcely one month of perfect repose ; and in fight they exhibited the most desperate valour on all occasions, though the abstemiousness of their rules was relaxed by degrees. They remained in the Holy Land after kings and barons had all yielded up the cause in despair. At length, in the year 1291, the Sultan Saladin drove them from their last stronghold of St John d'Acre, and compelled them to take refuge in Cyprus, then under a Latin King. They there summoned all their commanderies to send members and supplies, and were soon enabled once more to establish themselves as a powerful naval as well as military body. Their views were to harass the Mohammedans of Syria and Egypt by sea. One expedition more they made against the Saracens of Jerusalem ; but they found both that city and the other fortresses of the country to be in so ruinous a state, that the approach of the Egyptian sultan forced them to fly to their ships. It was immediately after this step that Fulk de Villaret, twenty-fourth grand-master of the order, seeing the hopelessness of any secure settlement of it on lands not its own, projected a great and important conquest—that of the Island of Rhodes. Rhodes is about 120 miles in circumference, and close on the coast of Asia Minor. It was at this time nominally a possession of the Greek emperor, Andronicus, but in reality was in the power of Saracenic pirates, mixed with Greeks of the same stamp. Fulk de Villaret gathered his war-galleys, and made a bold descent on the isle. The resistance was obstinate, and years elapsed ere the knights succeeded in planting the standard of the white cross on the walls of Rhodes. But they persisted in the siege till they made it their own.

The fate of the Knights-Templars, almost at this very moment, shewed the importance and necessity of such a fixed settlement. Returning to its European commanderies, this wealthy order, the rival of that of the Hospitallers in fame and power, became soon a subject of jealousy and avaricious envy to the monarchs of the time, and especially to Philip of France. In concert with the pope, that sovereign, under colour of forged charges of criminality, wrested its property from the order, and subjected its members to imprisonment, tortures, and death. Other countries also abolished the order, but without the same accompanying barbarities. Philip of France was partly disappointed, for the pope forced him to accede to a general edict, giving the Templar possessions to the Knights of St John.

The latter body was greatly increased in power by these accessions, and it became more common than ever for the younger nobility of Europe to enter the order of the Hospitallers. Riches brought with it augmented luxury and many evils, but the knights were still kept in high military condition. A new race of the followers of Mohammed appeared against them. Othman (the Bone-Breaker), who gave a permanent name to the Turkish nation, possessed, with a tribe of Turkomauns, the region of Asia Minor adjoining Rhodes. He attacked the knights in their city; but, though one of the most tried and renowned warriors of his race, he failed to make the slightest impression on them. Similar assaults were renewed in more alarming shapes in the course of the years immediately succeeding. Betwixt the year 1310, when the order settled at Rhodes, and the year 1453, when the Turks took Constantinople, and founded a new empire, the Knights of St John fought many great battles, by sea and land, with the two Mohammedan powers in their neighbourhood—the Egyptian and Turkish. It is amazing to reflect, that this comparatively small body of men should not only have foiled so many efforts made by these powerful sovereignties to reduce them and take their stronghold, but should have even obtained possession of Cos and other Greek islands, captured Smyrna, and held it for a long period, and made various expeditions against Syria and other places, as if possessed of the population and resources of a strong and warlike nation. They proved an unextractible thorn in the sides of the foes of Christianity.

Our space will only permit of a mere sketch being given of the career of the order; but we may allude specially to one event, the most important in its annals. The hour came at length for the fall of Rhodes, after the knights had held it for more than 200 years. Solyman the Magnificent resolved at any price to oust them from their stronghold. We quote from Sutherland's history of the order, in the passage that follows. In June 1522, 'a signal from Mount St Stephen intimated to the Rhodians that the Turkish fleet was in sight. Countless sails studded the Lycian Strait; and tumult and wailing instantly rose from every quarter of the city. The gates were formally shut, and public prayers were offered up in the churches, imploring Heaven to grant the victory to the champions of the Cross. This done, the whole population hurried to the ramparts and towers, to behold the terrible armament that threatened them with destruction. Four hundred sail swept past the mouth of the haven with the pomp and circumstance of a triumphal pageant; and on board this mighty fleet were 140,000 soldiers, exclusive of 60,000 serfs, torn from the forests of the Danube, to serve as pioneers.' Six hundred knights, with less than 5000 regular troops, and a comparatively weak body of citizens and peasants, formed the whole force prepared to oppose this immense armament, the leader of which, Solyman, in person, told his troops that he had come to Rhodes, 'to conquer or die.' For upwards of three months, the most awful scenes of carnage took place daily, after the siege had begun. For one man who fell among the knights, twenty fell among the Turks; but even this proportion was ruinous to the former. In one assault, 15,000 Turks were slain. By degrees, every one of the ramparts of Rhodes was in ruins; yet still the knights and their grand-master, a venerable old man, were unconquerable. They filled the breaches with their mailed bodies. Frequently Solyman half resolved to give up the struggle, and frequently he threatened his officers with death for their want of success. He proposed various capitulations, and by capitulation was the siege finally closed. The knights were unvanquished, but Rhodes was untenable. Twelve days were given them to embark their property; and on the 1st of January 1523, the remnant of the Rhodian Christians went on board their galleys, a homeless band. Before that departure, Solyman, who had in him great points of character, sought an interview with L'Isle Adam, the grand-master. 'For a time the two warriors eyed each other with piercing glances. The venerable and majestic port of the grand-master won the admiration of the youthful despot, and he magnanimously requested his interpreter to console the Christian chief with the assurance, that even the bravest of men were liable to become the sport of fortune. He invited him, at the same time, to embrace the Mohammedan faith, and enter his service, since the Christian princes, who had abandoned him in his extremity, did not merit the alliance of so redoubted a chief; and, by way of a bribe, promised to advance him to the highest dignities in his empire, and make him one of his chosen counsellors. The grand-master answered, that were he to dishonour his gray hairs by becoming a traitor and renegade, he would only shew how unworthy he was of the high opinion which his conqueror entertained of him; and that he would far rather retire into obscurity, or part with life itself, than be accounted a recreant and apostate by his own people. Solyman dismissed the venerable knight with honour; and said to Achmet Pacha, who was in attendance: "It is not without regret that I drive this unfortunate old man, full of sorrow, from his home."

The Knights of St John had still their commanderies, rich and powerful, over Europe, though Henry VIII., about this very time, abolished the order in England. But their importance was yet sufficient to procure for them the cession of the island of Malta, where their numbers were soon recruited. Removed in some measure, however, from the sphere of Turkish and Egyptian operations, the knights came now into hostility with new enemies of their faith. The African coasts swarmed at this time, as they also did at a much later date, with pirates, who filled their coffers with gold, and their dungeons with captives, from the European states. In concert with the Emperor Charles, the Knights of Malta undertook a great expedition against the two Barbarossas, the most famous pirates of the day, who had gained sovereign power in Algiers and Tunis by expelling the rightful princes. Tunis and Goletta were conquered on this occasion, chiefly by the dauntless valour of the Knights of St John, and the rightful governments were re-established. But in a future expedition, the order lost a great force before Algiers, and a garrison of theirs was expelled with vast loss from Tripoli.

For the next half century, the knights waged incessant war with the piratical Mohammedans, both of Africa and the Turco-Grecian islands. The importance of their services to European commerce was fully shewn by the renewed attempts of the Ottoman Porte to suppress them. In 1565, one great attempt was made by 30,000 Turks on the island. The assault of the small fort of St Elmo will shew the bravery of the knights in a fair light:—‘At daybreak on the 16th of June, the Turkish galleys commenced a furious cannonade against the seaward rampart; and at the same time the land-batteries shattered into ruin the still remaining fortifications. This done, the Osmanlis entered the ditch to the sound of their proud but barbarous music; and, at the discharge of a signal-gun, rushed impetuously to the assault, covered by 4000 arquebusiers and cross-bowmen, who, from their post in the trenches, shot down every Christian soldier who shewed himself in the breach. Behind that deadly gap stood the knights and their scant battalion, armed with pikes and spontoons, and forming, as it were, a living wall. Between every three soldiers stood a knight, the better to sustain the courage of those who had nothing of chivalrous renown to uphold them. In vain did the Turks dash themselves on this impenetrable phalanx. When swords and pikes were broken, the Christian soldiers grappled with their antagonists, and terminated the death-struggle with their daggers. The burning hoops were of eminent service in this combat; and the cries of the wretches whom they begirt, added greatly to the horror of the fight. It was a cheering circumstance to the defenders of the fort, that the conflict was maintained under the eyes of their friends in the Bourg, who, they feared, had begun to doubt their bravery. Amid the thunder of the artillery, and the groans of the dying, their ears were gladdened at intervals by encouraging shouts wafted across the haven from the distant ramparts; and the guns of Forts St Angelo and St Michael played incessantly, and with considerable effect, on the Turkish lines. At the end of six hours, the knights, covered with wounds, and blistered by the scorching rays of the sun, had the consolation to hear a retreat sounded from the enemy's trenches; and the Turks reluctantly retired, leaving behind them 2000 dead. When the last defender fell, the Turks became masters of St Elmo. But they were ultimately driven from the island, with a loss of 25,000 men.

The order was congratulated by all Europe on this occasion. For the next century, it continued to maintain maritime combats of lesser note, chiefly in contest with the African pirates. But its utility and its wealth gradually departed. The other powers of Europe became owners of great fleets, which reduced the galleys of St John to total insignificance; and there being no longer occasion for their services, the possessions of the knights slipped by degrees from their grasp. Besides, islands could no longer be wrested even from Mohammedans, or expeditions made against them: treaties and alliances bound both parties to peace. At length, in the time of the sixty-ninth grand-master, Bonaparte appeared before Valetta, the Maltese capital, and, after a feeble show of opposition, took possession of the island. The inhabitants seem to have been utterly tired of the rule of the knights ; and the latter ceded Malta to the French, by a treaty which bound them at once to quit the isle. They received petty annuities in lieu of this their ancient possession.

The British expelled the French ; but the knights returned to Malta no more. An attempt at the re-establishment of the order was made by Paul of Russia, which ended in nothing. Thus fell the renowned brotherhood of the Knights-Hospitallers of St John. The extent of their possessions at one time, as well as those of the Templars, is shewn by the numberless places, in Britain and elsewhere, to which they have permanently given names.

THE DIVINING-ROD.

THERE formerly prevailed, and still to some extent prevails, a superstitious notion, that the position of minerals and hidden springs of water, and even stolen property, and the guilt of criminals, might be discovered by the use of a succulent elastic twig, which has thence received the name of the Divining-Rod. In the progress of knowledge, the use of this instrument as an aid to the inquiries of justice has been abandoned ; but it is still employed in America, and other parts of the world, for the discovery of metals and water. More than one English writer has spoken highly of the esteem in which it has been held by the miners of Britain. In France, as lately as 1781, a volume was published, ‘ detailing six hundred experiments, made with all possible attention and circumspection, to ascertain the facts attributed to the divining-rod ; by which is unfolded their resemblance to the admirable and uniform laws of electricity and magnetism.’ In America, there are many decided friends of the divining-rod, and the public journals of that country not unfrequently contain letters of respectable correspondents, stoutly maintaining its pretensions to truth and utility. It is also to America that we are indebted for the first attempt we are aware of to explain the phenomena which have given rise to the superstition. We allude to an article in a number of Professor Silliman's American Journal of Science, which we shall abridge for the instruction, and, we trust, the entertainment also, of our readers.'

Those wishing to have a divining-rod, usually take a forked branch of any tree whose bark is smooth, and whose fibre is very elastic. The witch-hazel is in the highest esteem, not merely for its potent name, but also for the convenient size and ready forks of its plenteous branches, and the uncommon elasticity of its fibre. The peach and the cherry are often used. The limbs of the fork should be eighteen inches, or two feet in length, and of the diameter of a pipe-stem. When used, it is grasped at the extremity of each limb by the hands, the palms being turned upwards, and the fingers inwards, to the body. The rod is held loosely in this manner, until the diviner begins to apprehend the action of the hidden influence, when he tightens his grasp, and the limbs of the rod become bent from their middle to their lower extremities outward. The diviner, holding the twig carefully in this fashion, moves onward with a slow and creeping step. In due time, the head of the fork turns downwards, and, coming to point perpendicularly to the earth, is supposed to mark the site of the fountain or ore.

The action of the rod, under these circumstances, is a fact plain to the vision of every beholder. Those who hold it are oftentimes men in whose hands life, property, and reputation, might be intrusted; and no doubt they are wholly unconscious of the power which excites the action of the rod, and are themselves the greatest dupes to their art. Nor is this superstitious belief confined to the illiterate. It is by no means unusual for men of learning, in want of fountains for domestic use, to call for the demonstrations of the divining-rod, and occasionally to acknowledge its success. While the diviner is prosecuting his search, the rod discovers its sensibility by the motion of the point from its vertical position downwards, through the arc of a semicircle, until it rests perpendicular to the earth, when the desired spot is considered as found. This motion, so far from being intended by the holder of the rod, is said to be made in opposition to the closest grasp his hands can give; so much so, that the green bark is generally ruptured, as it is fairly wrung from the rod in the contest between the force which bears the point of the rod down, and the pinching grasp of the diviner to prevent that motion. But the rod does not exhibit this mysterious action in the hands of every man. It is only with a few charmed individuals that it is supposed to move, not only involuntarily, but contrary to their best efforts. These few are of no peculiar age, constitution, or habits, to distinguish them from their fellow-men; though it may be observed, that no females have been known to possess the gift.

Diviners pretend to no change in their feelings during the action of the rod, and attribute the whole to the attracting influence of something unseen. The art is highly valued in the southern and western states of America, where water is neither abundant, in general, nor pure. Here the water-hunter obtains celebrity. He is sent for to a great distance, and performs wonders, with praiseworthy modesty, and for a moderate compensation. If he endeavour to extend his art to the discovery of metals, however, he is generally looked upon with some suspicion, notwithstanding a common belief that his ability equals his pretensions. This he turns to account, by declaring, when his rod fails to discover water, that the counteracting presence of some mineral must have caused his want of success.

The true secret of this remarkable delusion is explained in the following manner, by the American writer:—‘In the year 1821, he visited the residence of a respectable man in Ohio, where he happened to notice a new well, at rather an inconvenient distance from the house. On inquiring into the reason, his friend informed him that it had been selected by the divining-rod, and was but seven or eight feet deep; a circumstance somewhat rare, and a triumphant witness to the powers of the rod. It had been discovered by a respectable man, a regular professor of the art. The curiosity of the visitor was excited, and on learning that the rod marked perfectly well in the hands of one of the farmer's sons, he obtained leave to try some experiments with him. The boy was about twelve years of age, and was by no means disinclined to the task, being not a little proud of his supposed gifts. Divining-rods were prepared from every shrub and tree in the forest, and the grass-plot in which the new well was situated, was selected as the scene of trial, because there the discoverer of the spring had already traced out three distinct veins of water. After the visitor had endeavoured, unsuccessfully, to make the rod exhibit its singular movement in his own hands, he directed the boy to try whether it would take any notice of a swift brook which ran on one side of the enclosure. The boy, after repeated trials in various ways, declared himself sensible of some motion in the rod, but thought the attraction of the brook far inferior to that of a hidden vein of water. The three veins of water formerly indicated, were next traced by the boy over the space of an acre, and their whole course marked behind him on the light turf with a stick. During the process, the young diviner was repeatedly asked, if he was sure he was going on correctly, and constantly answered in the affirmative. This done,' says the writer, 'I blindfolded him so that he could not see, took him lightly by the elbow, and led him away from the furrow marking the vein of water on which the new well had been sunk. After a few steps, I turned with him, requesting him to hold up the rod for discovery. I guided him back, but he chose the time of every step. The rod began to turn, and when, having finished its circuit, it turned perpendicular to the earth, he stopped. "Do you mean that the rod points exactly to the vein of water?"'

"Yes," he replied. And indeed it did : with his eyes he could not have pointed it out more correctly.

'This was demonstration. Conviction could neither be resisted nor avoided. The sight of the new well had pre-possessed me in favour of the divining-rod. The experiment with the lad had been conducted fairly, and its result was irresistibly conclusive. It must convince every one ; and to obtain a collection of facts which would put the question at rest for ever, I continued the experiment.' But, alas ! for the reputation of the divining-rod. The blindfolded boy was led from one place to another, and failed incessantly to discover the traces of his lately-discovered springs. The rod pointed often enough, and every time it did so, the place was marked ; but though the experiment was persisted in till the whole grass-plot became figured with black spots, the courses of the original three veins were never once lighted upon. This speedily settled the matter in the mind of the boy's companion. The illusion of the fountains, and of all attraction under ground, vanished at once. The motion of the rod remained still a mystery, but it must be accounted for in some other way. 'In all my experiments with diviners since,' continues the writer, 'I have found them very shy of a blinder. No diviner has proved so traitorous to his own self-respect as to test the skill of the rod by depriving it of the light of his own eyes. One whose age and respectability obliged me to pay him deference, was pleased with the suggestion of trying the rod over running water above ground. Across a neighbouring stream, a huge tree had been prostrated, its capacious trunk serving as a firm pathway over the swift waters. On this the good man crossed the brook, holding the divining-rod properly in his hands. As he came over the water, the point of the rod began to turn, but did not reach the end of its motion until he had fairly crossed the stream, and stepped on the opposite bank. In repeat-

above ground, but not so much as by water under ground. He held the rod with peculiar spirit, and an air of determination. Hoping to catch his lively manner, I took a rod, as I stood on the bank of the rivulet, and tried my own hands again. I moved neither hand nor foot, but the rod commenced its action; neither could I restrain it. He who has held the Leyden jar in one hand, while, for the first time in his life, he received its electric charge with the other, will recognise the sensation which communicated itself to the heart, when I felt the limbs of that rod crawling round, and saw the point turning down, in spite of every effort my clenched hands could make to restrain it. To my great satisfaction, without moving from the spot, I found the bark start and wring off from the limbs of the rod in the contest, just as the diviner often shews, to convince himself and his employer of the discovered fountain. It was manifest that the force moving the divining-rod is unconsciously applied by the hands of the diviner, and that the great art in holding the rod consists in holding it spiritedly. A smooth bark and a moist hand appeared to have a substantial connection with divining, and from that day till this, the rod has never failed to move in my hands, nor in the hands of those I instruct.

'Take the rod in the diviner's manner, and it is evident that the bent limbs of the rod are equivalent to two boughs tied together at one extremity; and, when bent outwards, they exert a force in opposite directions upon the point at which they are united. Held thus, the forces are equal and opposite, and no motion is produced. Keep the arms steady, but turn the hands on the wrists inward an almost imperceptible degree, and the point of the rod will be constrained to move. If the limbs of the rod be clenched very tightly, so that they cannot turn, the bark will burst and wring off, and the rod will shiver and break under the action of the opposing forces. The greater the effort made in clenching the rod, the shorter is the bend of the limbs, and the greater the amount of opposing forces meeting in one point; and the more unconsciously, also, do the hands incline to turn to their natural position on the wrists. And this gives true ground for the diviner's declaration, that the more powerful his efforts are to restrain the rod, the more powerful are its efforts to move.'

This seems to be the true secret of an absurd superstition, prevalent amongst an intelligent community, by which the performer, and those who place confidence in his art, are equally deceived. The practice is followed by so many persons of respectable character, that it would be unjust to attribute fraud to them, and we must conclude that they are themselves in total ignorance of the truth. Any one may convince himself that the writer above quoted is correct in his solution of the mystery of the divining-rod, by simply tying together two large goose-quills at the tips, and using them in the same manner as the diviner uses his rod. Two pieces of whalebone will answer the same purpose; and, indeed, the American Journal informs us that a professional gentleman, a most excellent man, and a well-known diviner, not many years deceased, commonly used a fork of whalebone as a divining-rod.

There is another curious circumstance connected with this subject, which is, that the water-hunter not only pretends to determine the site of a fountain by his instrument, but also to discover the depth at which it is to be found. Having ascertained the supposed site of the water, he retires slowly to a little distance, and advances again cautiously towards the spot. The moment the rod begins to move, he stands still and marks the place. He repeats his examination in the same way in every direction around the discovered spring, and makes it appear that the rod is affected on every side within a circle of a certain extent. The diameter of this circle is exactly double the depth of the water. Suppose the depth of the well to be seven, then the diameter of the circle within which the rod is moved, will be fourteen feet; but, strange to say, if the water lies seven-times-seven feet below the surface, then the rod will point within a circle seven times larger;

or, in other words, the attraction increases with the distance!

The American writer concludes thus : ‘The pretensions of diviners are worthless. The art of finding fountains and minerals with a succulent twig is a cheat upon those who practise it, an offence to reason and common-sense, an art abhorrent to the laws of nature, and deserving of universal reprobation.’

ELLEN CLARE.

BY MISS AGNES STRICKLAND.

THE last beams of a glorious sunset, in the beginning of June, shone on the castellated hall of Rosecourt, one of the most splendid relics of Gothic architecture in England that had survived the assaults of sap and siege during the civil wars, or the yet more destructive change of taste which in those modern days has inclined our nobility to replace the august time-honoured residences of their ancestors, with the mushroom white-brick edifices of the parvenu. The magnificent woods that rose in the background, and sloped down on either side to the shores of the Medway, were in the full pride of those tender, yet brilliant tints, which succeed the first unfolding of the summer foliage, and are too exquisite to linger long. The hedgerows were still white with the profuse blossoms of the hawthorn, and the park was enamelled with every variety of wild-flower.

The bells were ringing merrily from the old gray tower of the village church, on the opposite bank of the river, and the sound, mellowed as it was from the effect of the intervening waters, and mingled with the vesper-song of a thousand birds singing from brake and bough, fell sweetly on the listening ear, and conveyed ideas of festivity, peace, and joy. But these were feelings that found no place in the breast of the lonely and wearis-pedestrian who had just gained the summit of a gentle hill that commanded a view of the stately mansion, which now, for the first time, burst upon her sight in its baronial grandeur.

Ellen Clare felt herself painfully oppressed with contending emotions, as she paused to survey that fair domain and ancient seat of nobility, and, pressing her trembling hands upon her agitated bosom, as if to still its convulsive throbings, she asked herself if it were possible that the gold locket which she then wore, indeed contained a bright ringlet that had been shorn from the head of the heir of this proud family, and presented to her by himself, in exchange for one of her glossy raven tresses, when last they parted.

Since that time, what days of quietude had been hers ! Yet Ellen, in the fond confidence of trusting love, relied on the strength of Lord Mowbray's affection, and would have deemed she wronged him, had she entertained a doubt of his performing those oft-reiterated promises of marriage which he had made, not only personally, but by letter. Latterly, indeed, his letters had become shorter and less frequent, and at length he had ceased to write altogether. Some months had passed away since she had heard from him, but Ellen could not believe that this alarming proof of forgetfulness could proceed from falsehood or neglect. At first, she attributed Lord Mowbray's silence to accident, and lastly, to illness. Yes, she was sure he was ill, very ill, or he would have written to her ; and she thought it possible that her lordly lover, like Edwin in Mallet's touching ballad, was pining for her presence, and his proud family would not permit him to send for her ; and the simple girl wept with impassioned tenderness at the supposition.

Whatever may have been said in praise of solitude, it is a dangerous fosterer of the susceptibilities of a young and sensitive heart. Ellen Clare was the only surviving child of a widowed curate, with whom she had grown up from infancy, in the seclusion of the humble parsonage of an obscure village, far remote from the great metropolis.

Never having mingled with the world, she was alike unacquainted with its forms, its distinctions, its restraints, and its wiles. Her father, when not engaged in his pastoral duties, was too much absorbed in his studies to bestow much attention on the every-day concerns of life ; and he was therefore unconscious that his beautiful and beloved girl had arrived at that perilous season when paternal watchfulness and advice would be most required to supply the place of a mother's care.

Having no counsellor of her own sex on whose friendship she could rely, and shrinking from the task of disclosing her feelings to her father, she formed the desperate resolution of quitting her paternal roof under the cover of night, for the purpose of seeking Lord Mowbray at the hall of his ancestors.

Had Ellen known enough of the world to form a proper estimate of the accidents, perils, and distress to which she might possibly be exposed in the course of such a journey, and the bitter disappointment in which it was only too likely to end, it is probable that it never would have been undertaken ; but, unconscious of all that would have deterred a more experienced person—guided only by the deceitful beacon of a lover's hope—she left the home of her childhood, having first written a few incoherent lines to her father, in which she partially explained the reason of her flight.

While animated with the powerful excitement of pressing onwards to the completion of her arduous undertaking, doubts, fears, and even personal fatigue and suffering, were forgotten by the hapless traveller ; but when its difficulties were surmounted, and the weary miles that intervened between her native village and the distant and unknown bourn to which she had hurried, had been traversed, and Ellen gazed for the first time on the lordly towers of Rosecourt, the hope that had supported her through every trial died within her, for never till that moment had she fully comprehended the distinction which fortune had opposed between the heir of this princely domain and herself. But even while this conviction struck the chill of despair to her heart, love was ready to whisper: ‘Was not Mowbray aware of this vast disparity in their stations?’ and had he not sworn that a cottage shared with her would be preferable to all that the world could bestow without her? and the truth of her own guileless heart forbade the simple Ellen to suspect falsehood in the man on whom she had bestowed her youthful affections.

Anxious above all things to ascertain whether he were at the castle, she timidly approached the porter’s lodge, and requested a glass of water. Sarah Colton, the porter’s wife, was struck with the youth and loveliness of the weary pedestrian, and, observing that she appeared overcome with heat and fatigue, invited her to enter and take a seat, telling her, at the same time, that cold water was improper for her, but if she would wait till her daughter came in with the pail, she would give her some new milk and a home-baked cake. Ellen gratefully availed herself of this kind offer; and when the porter’s wife, in the course of conversation, asked her if she had ever seen the fine old hall, she replied in the negative, and eagerly embraced the opportunity of inquiring if the family were at home.

‘The earl and countess are both at the castle,’ replied Sarah; ‘and my young lord is expected to return this evening.’

Ellen’s heart beat quick and tumultuously; her colour went and came; and, in a voice scarcely articulate from strong emotion, she demanded, ‘if Lord Mowbray would pass through these gates on his way to the castle?’

‘We shall be greatly disappointed if he does not,’ replied the good woman: ‘do you not see how gaily we have dressed the archway with flowers for them to pass under? All the tenants have gone out on horseback to meet them. There is a band of music stationed on the road, to strike up a lively tune as soon as the carriage comes in sight, and there will be fireworks in the park to-night. We did not have half such grand doings at my Lady Jane’s wedding, because she chose to please herself, and marry a younger son, you know. But this is a match after my old lord's own heart, for the young lady is a duke's daughter, with a fine fortune, and suitable in all respects to be my Lord Mowbray's wife.'

'His wife!' shrieked Ellen: 'you do not mean to say that Lord Mowbray is married?'

'Surely I do,' returned the other; 'and if you wait a few minutes longer, you will see both him and his bride, for I know by the bells striking out such a brave peal, that the carriage is now crossing the bridge, and they will be at these gates almost immediately.'

The hue of death overspread the features of the wretched Ellen at these words, and she fixed her eyes upon the speaker with a look of such unutterable despair, that the most inexperienced person in the world might have comprehended the intensity of her agony, though she shed no tears.

'Good luck!' cried Sarah in some alarm, 'do you know anything of our young lord, that the news should upset you thus? And yet it is no such great news neither, for he has been married these five months; only he has been on his bridal tour, as folks call it, and this is the first time of his bringing her ladyship home to the hall.'

The cold drops of mental agony stood on Ellen's brow. She rose from her seat, and moved towards the door with hurried but tottering steps; and when the porter's wife proffered her the promised refreshment, she put it aside with a ghastly smile; and though her colourless lips murmured something that was meant to express acknowledgments for her kindness, the words were inarticulate.

'Poor, poor young thing!' said the compassionate Sarah, casting a piteous regard on Ellen's figure. 'A lady too! But you shall not go, indeed you shall not, till you are better,' continued she, stepping betwixt Ellen and the door.

'Let me depart!' cried the wretched girl, in a voice broken and hoarse from strong emotion. 'I tell you I will not be detained,' she added fiercely.

'Dearest young lady, do not be angry,' returned Sarah soothingly; ‘but indeed I could not answer it to my conscience if I permitted you to quit the lodge in your present state of mind.’

‘Nay, but I will go!’ shrieked Ellen, in a tone of the wildest desperation. ‘Do you think I will stay to see him, now he is the husband of another? And he would know me, too! Oh! let me go hence, for pity’s sake.’

‘Hush, dearest lady!’ whispered the porter’s wife, drawing her back, and reseating her with gentle violence: ‘you cannot leave the lodge now without meeting the carriage. Surely you would not wish to do that?’

The merry notes of the pipe and tabour, the roll of the drums, and the flourish of the wind-instruments, mixed with the pealing of the bells, and the joyful acclamations of the peasantry announcing the near approach of Lord Mowbray and his bride, smote on the ear of Ellen like the knell of herself and her father. A stupifying horror stole over her—her brain reeled—a darkening mist shaded her eyes—breath and circulation were alike suspended—and the ground appeared receding from beneath her feet; but the roll and rush of the carriage-wheels, dashing up to the park gates, roused her from the insensibility into which she was gradually sinking. At first, so far from availing herself of the opportunity of surveying the bridal party, while she herself remained unseen, she closed her eyes, and pressed her hands upon them, to exclude, if possible, the light of day; but when the open carriage stopped under the arched gateway, and the dearly loved and fatally familiar voice of Lord Mowbray met her ear, her eyes instinctively followed that sound, and she looked once more upon him—and more than that, she glanced with a sudden and desperate curiosity from him to her fortunate rival; and though she did not, like her luckless namesake in the old ballad, exclaim: ‘Is this your bride, Lord Thomas?’ yet, in the very climax of her misery, she could not help observing that Lady Mowbray was many years older than herself, and that her personal attractions, even when set off in the bridal finery of lilac satin, white feathers, and Brussels lace, could not equal her unadorned charms. ‘But he does not think so!’ she sighed, as she withdrew her eyes, and closed them in despair; for what to her, in this withering desolation of heart, were the fairest possessions of youth and beauty?

Lord Mowbray spoke again, and once more the unhappy Ellen felt herself impelled to listen, for the soft soothing tones of tenderness in which he spoke, were so precisely the same in which he had been accustomed to address herself, that she scarcely believed it possible that they could be uttered to another ear than hers. It was, however, to Lady Mowbray, to his wife, that he now turned and said, with an air of affectionate solicitude: ‘Caroline, my love, wrap your cloak about you. The mist is rising from the river, and I am apprehensive lest you should take cold, as we must proceed through the park at a slow pace, out of compliment to those good people who have come to meet us, and welcome their future lady to Rosecourt. Indeed, you look fatigued. I fear the exertion of travelling twenty miles to-day has been too much for you in your present situation.’

Whatever was Lady Mowbray’s reply, Ellen heard it not — a pang more bitter than death had transfixed her heart. Her anguish was too mighty for her feeble, travel-worn frame, and with a suppressed hysterical sob, she sank upon the ground. . . . It was well for the forlorn stranger that she had fallen into the hands of good Samaritans. During her illness, she was attended with the utmost solicitude. A dangerous fever had seized upon her frame, and for many days Ellen vibrated between life and death, reason and insanity: yet not so fortunate as to find forgetfulness in delirium, the cause of her distress was ever present to her mind; and she raved continually about Lord Mowbray and her wrongs, till the whole story became familiar to the humble but compassionate inhabitants of the lodge. While the porter’s family were yet undecided in what manner to make known the circumstance to their young lord, he received a hasty summons to embark with his regiment for the Peninsula, to join the army under the command of Sir John Moore ; and the only opportunity that offered for addressing his lordship on the subject, was when he was about to pass through Colton's gates, on his way to London. Lord Mowbray was then hurried, and much agitated, having just taken a final leave of his parents and his wife, but the earnest and solemn manner in which Sarah Colton entreated him to enter the lodge, and listen to a sad story in which he was only too deeply concerned, induced him reluctantly to comply with her request. She led him, without further explanation, into the chamber where, with death-pale features, and eyes which, although open, were rayless, and unconscious of outward objects, lay the attenuated form of his once lovely and beloved Ellen. ‘ Merciful Heaven !’ cried Lord Mowbray, stepping back in utter consternation, while the colour faded from his quivering lip, ‘ what is the meaning of this ? How came she here ?’

‘ She came hither, my lord, in search of you, as we suppose, the evening on which you brought my Lady Mowbray to the castle ; but she has never been in her right mind since.’

‘ My lord, he was born on the following day. His poor mamma had hard travail, and was sore distressed in mind ; for when my daughter and I, like the women in holy writ, who thought to comfort the dying Rachel, brought the sweet babe to her, and told her she had born a living and a lovely boy, she replied in Rachel’s very words : “ Call him Benoni, or the son of sorrow.” ’

Lord Mowbray snatched the babe to his bosom, and burst into a passion of tears. ‘ Poor deserted one !’ murmured he, ‘ thou shalt be the more dearly cherished, for that I can never compensate the wrongs which I have done to thee and thy hapless mother.’

‘ Ah !’ shrieked Ellen, who had recognised him, for that loved voice had power to pierce through the cloud that had fallen on her benighted mind—‘ he is there ! It is Mowbray who has come to behold the ruin he has wrought. Ah, Frederic, I am not like what I was when you called me your beautiful, your only beloved.

“ How could you say my face was fair,
And yet that face forsake ?
How could you win my virgin heart,
Then leave that heart to break ? ”

They tell me I am mad, Frederic. I wish, indeed, I were, for then I might forget you, and what you said to the lady in the lilac satin and grand white feathers. I have no fine white feathers, Mowbray ; if I had, perhaps you would love me still, for I am younger and fairer than she. Her eyes are small, and of a dull-gray colour—mine are of the darkest hazel. Her hair is red, and you were wont to praise black hair, and to say no hair could be more black and glossy than mine. Its jetty hue is still unchanged. Ask the raven that sits croaking on the thorn opposite the window if his wing can match it. But you must not mind me, for I am talking very foolishly. Indeed, I never knew that I was fair till you told me so, Mowbray, and then I was only too proud. But I was wrong to believe you, for you have told me much that was untrue ; ay, and you have sworn falsely too, for you swore that you would make me your wife, but you have wedded another, and left me to die unpitied.’

‘ Say not so, Ellen—say not so,’ returned Lord Mowbray in a hoarse and broken voice. ‘ Oh, Ellen, you have not suffered more than I do now.’

‘ Oh, no, no ! ’ cried Ellen, laughing bitterly ; ‘ you must not tell me so. You cannot tell the pangs of a dishonoured maiden in the day when her glory is turned to reproach and shame ; you cannot feel the distraction of the guilty one who has brought infamy on her father’s house, and covered his gray hairs with shame, as I have done ; and above all, Mowbray, what should you know of the agonies of the unwedded mother, who has brought the brand of contempt and disgrace upon the son of her bosom?—you have felt nothing of this—yet it is all your work.'

'Spare me, Ellen, for the love of Heaven!' cried Lord Mowbray, dashing his clenched hand against his brow with frantic violence.

'I fancy you are going to be mad too,' said Ellen; 'but then, remember it was not my cruelty that made you so.'

'No, my poor injured Ellen, not you, but the pangs of remorse, which are harder to bear than all you have told me,' said Lord Mowbray.

'Ha!' shrieked Ellen, 'have they found you, betrayer? Then, indeed, you will be punished; for the pangs of remorse are sharper than a two-edged sword, piercing to the dividing of soul and body; but, Mowbray, cruel Mowbray! the stings of falsehood are sharper still.'

Lord Mowbray bowed his face upon the bosom of his infant, and wept audibly. The tender-hearted Sarah and her daughter sobbed aloud in very pity of the sufferings of Ellen and their young lord's distress, and the babe, whose slumbers had been dispelled by the violence of his father's grief, uttered a feeble wailing cry. The appeal was not lost on the heart of the young mother. She raised herself from the pillow with an expression of maternal tenderness and solicitude beaming in her lately rayless and wandering eyes, which restored to them much, very much, of their former beauty. The lustre of those lovely dark eyes, which had once been as the loadstars of Mowbray's soul, had indeed been diminished by excessive weeping, but there was still the perfect moulding of the exquisitely marked and snowy lids, with their long jetty fringes, which neither sickness nor sorrow could change; and he thought, as she turned them with a look of melancholy fondness on her infant, that he had never seen eyes so beautiful; yet the latent fire of frenzy lurked in their troubled brightness. 'My child,' she murmured: 'bring him to me, Phœbe; I know wherefore he laments, but I cannot relieve him. Other mothers can play the sweet office of a nurse to their offspring, but this was denied to me: the fountain of maternal nourishment has been turned to tears,' she added, pressing her burning hands upon her bosom ; ' yet I cannot weep now. Sarah weeps, Phœbe weeps, my little one weeps, even Mowbray weeps, but I do not—I have no tears left : I have exhausted them all, and my brain seems as though it were on fire. Mowbray, it is a very dreadful thing to be mad ! I am ill, very ill. There is a strange whirl and confusion in my mind, and my memory seems departing from me. They say I have a fever, and people, when they are suffering from such complaints, are subject to painful illusions. A young man in our village, who died of the typhus fever, told me, when I came to bring him nice things, " that he had a sort of horror upon his mind," which he called " a waking nightmare ;" and he fancied, too, that his sweetheart had played him false, and caused his illness ; and yet it was not so, for she died of the same fever, which she had caught while nursing him, and they were both buried in one grave. And perhaps—oh ! my beloved Frederic—it is the fantasy of my fever which makes me think that you have wrought my wo. Life of my life ! forgive me for the thought. You wrong your poor, fond, confiding Ellen. Oh, no ! Come near, my own Mowbray — my husband ! Nay, do not start, and turn away, nor weep so bitterly. I remember it all now. This is your fine castle of Rosecourt, of which you used to tell me so much. The proud earl, your father, is dead, and you are now the lord of Rosecourt, and I am your countess. I have born you an heir. He is the Lord Viscount Mowbray. Now, Phœbe, remember you are to call my baby My Lord. Frederic, you are weeping, but I am going where there is neither sorrow nor shedding of tears. Hark, I am called ! Frederic, listen ! Did you not hear the voice that said to my spirit, " Come away !" Other people hear a voice. I feel it—a deep unearthly voice, that thrills through every pulse and nerve, " Come away !" I cannot stay with you if I would. It is to my father that I am going.'

She raised herself up in the bed, and stretching forth her arms, exclaimed : ' I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him: “ Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee——” ”

The unfinished sentence died away on her quivering lip, the fitful hectic faded from her cheek, and the wild light which had irradiated her large dark eyes vanished, and the raised lids dropped languidly over their glassy orbs, as she sunk back with a low, deep-breathed sigh upon the pillow.

Lord Mowbray, with a fearful apprehension of the truth, raised her in his arms, and resting her cold cheek upon his bosom, conjured her to look up and speak once more ; but the call, the unearthly summons of which she spake, had been obeyed—it was that of death !

There was a deep and breathless pause, broken only by the stifled sobs of the women, while Lord Mowbray gazed in tearless agony on the victims of his selfish passions—the lifeless mother and the motherless babe. ‘ Yet, oh, my poor murdered Ellen ! ’ he said, ‘ I would not, if I could, recall thee to life, unless I could also restore to thee the spotless innocence and cloudless peace of which I cruelly bereaved thee. Thou hast escaped from the gulf of shame and sorrow into which I was the means of plunging thee ; and would, my lovely and only beloved one, I lay by thy side, as cold and calm as thee ! But no ! I could not hope to share the rest into which thou hast entered—there is no peace for the wicked.’

Here a sort of altercation was heard in the outer apartment between Colton and some one who appeared to be demanding admittance, and at length these words were spoken in a passionate tone of distress : ‘ She is here, and nothing earthly shall prevent my seeing her ; ’ and at the same moment the door of the chamber of death was burst open.

Lord Mowbray turned fiercely to the intruder, with intent to demand his business ; but, as if smitten by the bolt of heaven, fell prostrate in a swoon at the feet of him who now entered—it was the father of Ellen ! ‘ And is it thus we meet, my child ? ’ exclaimed the venerable man, throwing himself upon the bed, and clasping the lifeless form of his daughter to his bosom, with a burst of grief which might almost have wakened a responsive pang in the still, cold breast that had ceased to vibrate to the thrill of agony.

As for Lord Mowbray, when the return of long-suspended animation recalled him once more to a fresh consciousness of the tortures of remorse, he fiercely repelled those who were administering restoratives to him, and dashing himself with frantic violence upon the ground, exclaimed : ‘Why did you not leave me to die?’

‘Thy death,’ said the bereaved father, ‘can neither heal the hearts which thou hast broken, nor repair the ruin thou hast wrought.’

‘You cannot say anything which can increase my self-reproach, or add bitterness to the agonies of remorse under which I at present suffer,’ cried Lord Mowbray. ‘I dare not hope for your forgiveness, though I supplicate for it thus lowly in the dust.’

‘Kneel not to an erring fellow-creature, but to your offended God, young man!’ cried Mr Clare : ‘from me you have nothing to dread — not even the language of reproach. It is not for the minister of the Gospel to speak of wrath, but mercy. Go, and sin no more!’

Lord Mowbray was more deeply humbled by the generous forbearance of the man whom he had so irreparably injured, than if the severest punishment had been inflicted upon him by the father of his victim. Hitherto the fountain of the old man’s grief had been locked up ; but when Phœbe, who had silently watched her moment, approached, and placed the infant of his lost Ellen in his arms, his stern and solemn sorrow melted into tenderness, and his tears fell fast upon its innocent face. ‘Come to my heart, thou sinless child of sin and shame!’ he exclaimed. ‘Thou art precious in my sight for thy dear mother’s sake, although thy birth has brought her maiden glory to the dust, and covered my gray hairs with dis-honour. Thou shalt go with me, dear babe ; and while I live, shall never want a father’s love, though the long grass will soon wave over thy mother’s grave——’

'The child is mine!' interrupted Lord Mowbray, with passionate vehemence: 'let him remain with me, and I will undertake that he shall have the education and fortune that befit the son of a nobleman.'

'My lord,' said Mr Clare, 'you are a married man, and this child might prove a cause of contention between yourself and Lady Mowbray; but while I live, he shall never be reproached with his mother's fault. You say that you will give him the breeding meet for a nobleman's son, I will give him that of a humble Christian; and while I possess a morsel of bread to share with him, I will not receive on his account anything that is in your gift.'

Lord Mowbray would have made arrangements respecting the funeral of Ellen, but her father replied: 'No, my lord, it shall not be: poor as I am, I shall find means to provide my unhappy daughter with a grave, without being indebted to the charity of him who has brought her there.'

Lord Mowbray had fondly anticipated glory in his military career, but he arrived in the Peninsula only to share in the hardships of the disastrous retreat to Corunna. He had sighed for laurels, and at length he gathered them; but it was on that fatal plain where victory was only the herald of flight. He returned to England with the loss of an arm, broken in constitution, and with a settled gloom on his mind, to take possession of the estates and earldom of Rosecourt, to which his father's recent demise entitled him; but the first news that greeted him there was, that his wife had died in giving birth to a son, who had only lived to receive a name, and was laid with his mother in the family vault of the proud Mowbrays.

Lord Mowbray had married this lady in compliance with his father's commands, while his affections were centered in the beautiful but lonely girl to whom he had pledged his false vows. But the amiable qualities of Lady Mowbray had won his esteem; her connections had aggrandised his family, and he had reckoned on enjoying years of quiet happiness in her society, and on seeing a lovely offspring growing up around him, who would carry down his honours to posterity. It was not to be : neither peace nor domestic ties were in store for him. A long and dangerous illness, brought on by distress of mind, next attacked him, and during the weary hours of his protracted convalescence, conscience was perpetually reminding him that his punishment, however heavy and hard to be borne, was less in proportion than his crimes had merited, and his lonely pillow was incessantly haunted with troubled dreams and self-upbraiding thoughts of Ellen Clare and her child. That child, did it still live ? Dared he hope to be permitted to see and embrace it once more ? The strong yearnings of parental instinct had been powerfully awakened in his breast by this infant, even in that dark and sorrowful hour in which he first became conscious of its existence ; and now that he had been bereaved of every other tie on earth, he clung to its idea with the most impassioned tenacity. At last, his feverish longings to behold it once more became so overpowering, that, as soon as it was possible to endure the fatigue of travelling, he ordered four horses to his post-chariot, and scarcely tarried on the road for rest or refreshment till he found himself once more in the precincts of Mr Clare's humble parsonage. Two years only had elapsed since the day when he had parted with the luckless Ellen, but they had been marked with events which had converted them into an age of wo, and scattered gray hairs prematurely among his golden ringlets. It was with a faltering and irresolute hand that he knocked at the lowly portal. His summons was unanswered ; and after repeating it several times in vain, finding the door was on the latch, and feeling himself unable to conquer impatience which now became painfully mingled with alarm, he entered, and turned towards Mr Clare's study, for he was only too familiar with the ways of the house. His hand was already on the lock, when the voice of lamentation from within struck his ear. He started and turned pale. It was the passionate burst of female sorrow, apparently in that abandonment of woe which refuses comfort. He thought of Ellen, but her broken heart was mingled with the dust; of her child—of his child; on the doubtful possibility of whose existence he had dared to build delusive schemes of earthly happiness amidst the darkness and desolation of his soul; and, forgetful of every other consideration, he entered the room unannounced, and stood for a moment an unnoticed spectator of a scene which for ever extinguished the trembling hope that had lingered within his bosom.

The light was partially excluded from the room by the half-closed shutters, but the slanting beams of the setting sun stole through the feathery wreaths of clematis which mantled over the casement, and, entering the apartment, notwithstanding all obstruction, cast a brightening glory on the silvery locks and pale countenance of Ellen's father, who was kneeling beside a little coffin, over which Phœbe Colton was bending in a mournful attitude, while her tears fell fast on the face of a beautiful dead infant, in whose cold hands she was placing the last pale roses of the year. 'It is my child, my only one!' exclaimed Lord Mowbray, springing forward with a cry of despair, for he had recognised the lovely features of its lost mother, which were blended with lineaments which as truly bespoke it a scion of his own proud race. The impress of perfect peace rested on its polished brow; and the long black silken lashes, so nearly resembling those of its unhappy mother, reposed on a rounded cheek, whereon the tender bloom yet lingered. There was a death-smile of angelic sweetness on its lips, and it looked a flower more fair than those which its fond nurse had scattered round it.

'My lord,' said Mr Clare, 'you have rightly claimed the young child. It is your own, your only one, you say. I, too, had once a child—an only one; but of her I will not speak. You can now understand the feelings of the bereaved parent, whose only child has gone down to the dust before him. But the death of yours was according to the course of frail mortality. The flower was smitten in the bud, and it withered. The gentle spirit passed away without a struggle, and, unstained by sin or sorrow, returned to the bosom of its Creator, pure as it came from his hands. Mine was a sorer grief, yet God forbid that I should reproach you with your sin in an hour like this. I would only ask you whether it would have been just, that from your guilty love, a branch of comfort should have sprung up, under whose shadow you might have found peace and repose in your latter days ?'

Mr Clare did not long survive the death of his grandson ; but the latest office of his sacred calling was, to read the burial-service over the remains of the last Earl of Rosecourt, who was interred, without funeral pomp, in the village church-yard beside the graves of Ellen and her child.*

LOUIS LE GRAND.

LOUIS XIV. of France, whose subjects bestowed upon him the title affixed to this paper, was a monarch marked by so many striking points of character, and spent a long life in circumstances altogether so remarkable, that we have resolved to make him the subject of a brief sketch. Born in the year 1638, he succeeded his father in his fifth year, and thus may be said to have scarcely ever known any other condition in life than that of a sovereign. His long reign of seventy-two years, during which Britain was governed by no fewer than eight successive potentates, was spent in almost uninterrupted wars, the chief purpose of which was his own aggrandisement ; and few periods of equal duration in the history of any country, have produced so many men eminent in arms, in arts, and in letters. But the expenses of this monarch impoverished his country ; his policy enslaved it ; and his own personal qualities, so far from being its honour, are in many respects its disgrace. The grand aim of Louis was to cause himself to be thought something above mortality—a kind of demigod; and in whatever way this end was to be brought about, whether by the extension of his dominions, or the cultivation of personal dignity, he was alike indefatigable. As a monarch, he was, or rendered himself, absolute; he had not even ministers, except of a merely subordinate kind. But on the death of his first wife, a Spanish princess, in 1683, he formed a secret matrimonial connection with Madame Maintenon, a beautiful woman, whose former husband was the celebrated Scarron, the novelist; and this person, in time, became a kind of prime-minister. The Duke de Saint-Simon, in his memoirs, gives the following insight into the qualities and habits of Louis:—

‘Though a young man and a king, Louis was not altogether without experience. He had been a constant frequenter of the house of the Countess de Soissons, the niece of Cardinal Mazarin, the resort of all that was distinguished, both male and female, that the age could produce, and where he first caught that fine air of gallantry and nobleness, which characterised him ever afterwards, and marked even his most trifling actions. For though the talents of Louis XIV. were in fact rather below mediocrity, he possessed a power of forming his manners and character upon a model, and of adhering to it, which is often more valuable in the conduct of life than the very greatest abilities. By nature, he was a lover of order and regularity; he was prudent, moderate, secret—the master both of his actions and his tongue. For these virtues, as they may be called in a king, he was perhaps indebted to his natural constitution; and if education had done as much for him, certainly he would have been a better ruler. He had a passion, however, or rather a foible—that was vanity, or, as it was then called, glory. No flattery was too gross for him—incense was the only intellectual food he imbibed. Independence of character he detested: the man who once, though but for an instant, stood up before him in the consciousness of manly integrity of purpose, was lost for ever in the favour of the king. He detested the nobility, because they were not the creatures of his breath—they had their own consequence; his ministers were always his favourites, because he had made them, and could unmake them; and because, moreover, they had abundant opportunities of applying large doses of the most fulsome flattery, and of prostrating themselves before him, of assuming an air of utter nothingness in his presence, of attributing to him the praise of every scheme they had invented, and of insinuating that their own ideas were the creatures of his suggestions. To such a pitch was this intoxication carried, that he who had neither ear nor voice might be heard singing, among his peculiar intimates, snatches of the most fulsome parts of the songs in his own praise.

‘ His love of sieges and reviews was only another form of this his only enthusiasm—his passion for himself. A siege was a fine opportunity for exhibiting his capacity; in other words, for attributing to himself all the talents of a great general. Here, too, he could exhibit his courage at little expense of danger, for he could be prevailed upon, as it were with difficulty, to keep in the back-ground, and by the aid of his admirable constitution, and great power of enduring hunger, thirst, fatigue, and changes of temperature, really exhibit himself in a very advantageous point of view. At reviews, also, his fine person, his skill in horsemanship, and his air of dignity and noble presence, enabled him to play the first part with considerable effect. It was always with a talk of his campaigns and his troops that he used to entertain his mistresses, and sometimes his courtiers. The subject must necessarily have been tiresome to them, but it was in some measure redeemed by the elegance and propriety of his expressions: he had a natural justness of phrase in conversation, and told a story better than any man of his time. The talent of recounting is by no means a common quality: he had it in perfection.

‘ If Louis had a talent for anything, it was for the management of the merest details. His mind naturally ran on small differences. He was incessantly occupied with the meanest minutiae of military affairs: clothing, arms, evolutions, drill, discipline—in a word, all the lowest details. It was the same in his buildings, his establishments, his household supplies: he was perpetually fancying that he could teach the men who understood the subject, whatever it might be, better than anybody else, and they, of course, received his instruction in the manner of novices. This waste of time he would term a continual application to business. It was a description of industry which exactly suited the purposes of his ministers, who, by putting him on the scent in some trivial matter, respecting which they pretended to receive the law from him, took care to manage all the more important matters according to their own schemes.

‘A circumstance which deserves attention, is the residence of this monarch at a distance from his capital. It was not without its design or its influence in the establishment of the absolute sovereignty, which was the favourite project of Louis XIV. From Paris he had been driven in his youth, and the memory of his flight was a bitter subject: there he never considered himself safe, besides being exposed to the observation of spirits of every description. At a court separate from the capital, he had his courtiers more immediately under his eye; absences could be easily marked, and cabals crushed in their infancy. Then came the ruinous taste for building, which it was more easy to indulge at Versailles or Marly than in the immediate neighbourhood of a crowded capital. His changes of residence were chiefly made for the purpose of creating and maintaining a number of artificial distinctions, by which he kept the court in a constant state of anxiety and expectation. It was the fashion to request to accompany him, to desire apartments near him; and according as these boons were granted, so was the courtier humiliated or exalted. When he resided at St Germain, Versailles served this purpose; when at Versailles, Marly; and though at Trianon the whole court were at liberty to present themselves, yet even there a distinction was made—that ladies might there eat with the king; and particular ones were pointed out to receive the honour as each meal arrived. The schemes of this kind were infinite, and kept his court in a state of perpetual excitement and anxiety to please.

'The just-au corps à brevet was an invention of the same kind: it was a uniform of blue, lined and turned up with red, and red waistcoat, embroidered with a grand pattern of gold and some silver. A small number only were permitted to wear this dress: it was one of the highest favours, and every means of interest were set on foot to obtain it. They who wore it, were alone permitted to accompany the king from St Germain to Versailles without being invited.

'One of his perpetual cares, was to be well informed of everything that was passing everywhere—in places of public resort, in private houses, the facts of ordinary intercourse, and the secrets of families. He had spies and reporters everywhere, and of all classes: some, who were ignorant that their information was meant for him; others, who knew that it ultimately reached him; a third set, who corresponded directly with him; and a fourth, were permitted to have secret interviews with him, through back-stairs. Information conveyed in this form was the ruin of many a man who never knew from what quarter the storm came. It was he who first invested the lieutenant de police with his dangerous functions, and which went on increasing: these officers were the most formidable persons about the court, and were treated with most decided consideration and attention by every one, even by the ministers themselves. There was not an individual, not excepting the princes of the blood, who had not an interest in preserving their good-will, and who did not try to do it. The opening of letters was another of the shameful means of procuring information. Two persons, Pajoute and Roullier, farmed the post, and apparently on this condition, for no efforts could ever succeed in displacing them or in augmenting their rent. This department of espionnage was performed with a most extraordinary dexterity and promptitude : generally, the heads only of remarkable letters were laid before the king ; in other instances, the letter itself. A word of contempt for the king or his government was certain ruin ; and it is incredible how many persons of all classes were more or less injured by these means. The secrecy with which it was conducted was impenetrable. Neither secrecy, nor yet dissimulation, was at all painful or difficult for the king.

‘ Louis XIV. was the model of a king who should have no state-duties to perform, who was required as the head of a court and the hero of addresses, petitions, levées, openings of a parliament, reviews, occasional festivals, and, in short, all the lighter duties of a constitutional monarch, with one exception—his passion for buildings. In all personal matters, he was perfect. There was a grace in all he did, a precision and an elegance in all he said, that rendered an attention from him a distinction. He knew the value of it, and may be said to have sold his words—nay, even his smile, even his looks. He spoke rarely to any one ; when he did, it was with majesty, and also with brevity. His slightest notice or preference was measured, or, as it were, proportionably weighed out. No harsh word ever escaped him : if he had occasion to reprimand or reprove, it was always done with an air of kindness, never in anger, and rarely even with stiffness.

‘ He may be said to have been polished to the very limits of nature : no one better marked the distinctions of age, merit, and rank, all which he took care to hit exactly in his manner of salutation, or of receiving the reverences on arrival or departure. His respectful manner to women was charming : he never passed even a chamber-maid without raising his hat ; and if he accosted a lady, he never replaced his hat till he had quitted her. These are what we call the manners of the old school : he was the perfecter of them, and one of their most successful professors, if not in some measure their creator.

‘ The perfect command of his person was in part the consequence of his excellence in all athletic sports and exercises. He loved the air, and was constantly out in it, either shooting (he was the best shot in France) or hunting. After he broke his arm, he used to follow the stag at Fontainebleau in a calash drawn by four ponies, which he managed at full gallop with admirable skill. He excelled also in dancing, a species of golf, and at racket ; and, up to a late period of his life, was an admirable horseman. Connected with his fondness for shooting, was his attachment to dogs, of which he used to keep seven or eight in his apartments, and feed them himself.

‘ He had a natural turn for magnificence and splendour ; and certainly it was scarcely possible for man to carry it farther ; and, like every other taste, it was extensively imitated, spread all over court, camp, and city, and reduced the nobility to poverty and difficulties—a result which he foresaw, and calculated on, to second his own purposes of subjugating the grand seigneurs of his dominions.

‘ It was the system of Madame de Maintenon and the ministers, for a series of thirty-four years, to render the king inapproachable in private. As he passed from council to mass, through galleries and ante-chambers, the courtiers had the privilege, whoever could catch it, of speaking to him, or whispering in his peruke any matter they might have at heart : his usual answer was a gracious Je verrai (I will see) ; and if the conversation was attempted to be continued, the king arriving at the door of his apartment, left the unhappy courtier to his reflections. By such contrivances as these, and a thousand others, the king was cut off from free communication with the world or his court, and with all his notions of despotic sway, was, in fact, a prisoner in the hands of a cabal—his mistress, his ministers, and his confessor, who took care to play into each other’s hands. The different ministers transacted business with the king in the apartment of La Maintenon, where she sat at work, apparently taking no notice of the conversation which passed. Sometimes the king would turn round, and ask her opinion, which she always gave timidly and modestly, generally coinciding with the minister : the fact all the time being, that the minister and she had previously settled the points in agitation. If, for instance, the matter in hand was a list of candidates for a particular employment, the minister went over the names until he came to the one Madame de Maintenon had previously consented to, and after balancing the merits of the various competitors, at last summed up in favour of the name he had stopped at. If the king preferred another, and was obstinate, he was led away from the subject ; other things were started, and the appointment was brought upon the carpet at another interview, when in all probability the humour had shifted. If the minister rebelled against the female sway, he was lost ; but if, on the other hand, he was adroit and obedient, Madame de Maintenon took care of his reward.

'To a woman of De Maintenon's ambition, the declaration of her marriage must necessarily have been an object near to her heart. On two several occasions, she had so far succeeded with the king, that he was on the point of acknowledging her, and twice he was prevented : first, by the ardent solicitation of Louvois ; and the second time, by the advice of Bossuet and Fénélon. Louvois was poisoned, and Fénélon disgraced. The Bishop of Meaux's authority with the king, the weight of his eloquence and character, and, more than all, the need of his services, prevented him from sharing the fate of the Archbishop of Cambray.

'The death-bed of this extraordinary man was as fine a piece of acting as any other in his life : if anything could have gone deeper than the external surface of form and etiquette, assuredly it would have been the last agony. But Louis died as he had lived—with all the grace and decorum he loved in his brightest moments. His several addresses to his different friends and attendants, and lastly to his heir, were distinguished by that neatness and propriety for which he was famous : in fact, so studied and so perfect is the whole scene, as described in the faithful pages of Saint-Simon, that it produces the effect of a well-acted play, and may almost be said to be affecting.

If the combined efforts of a nation of courtiers could ever raise a man out of humanity, it was done in the case of Louis le Grand : yet here he is, a dying god, on his bed, discovering, as the film comes across his physical sight, and at the same time drops from his intellectual vision, that his apotheosis has been a mistake. His only regret was, that he had neglected the interests of his subjects. His advice to the little dauphin (his great-grandson), not to build, not to make war, but to study the interests of his people, was as much as to say, "take the precisely opposite course which I myself have followed."

'He was long in dying : when he appeared at the worst, the courtiers deserted his apartments, and flocked about the Duke of Orleans, his successor as regent ; when he rallied somewhat, the reaction was sudden and complete, and the duke was left for a whole day without a visit from a single individual.'

Perhaps no man who ever sat upon a throne possessed greater power of doing good than Louis, yet no one with these advantages ever did greater mischief. His payment of bribes, or rather a sort of annual salary, to Charles II. of England, gave him no permanent power over this country ; while in his warlike views he was completely set at nought by Marlborough. His revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which stamps everlasting infamy on his reign, led to the unforeseen result of making England the place of refuge of thousands of Protestants, the most industrious among his subjects, and whose knowledge of certain manufactures tended alike to enrich their adopted country, and impoverish that which they had left. While the example which he ostentatiously set of the wildest profligacy, had the effect of sapping the morals of his people, his extravagance in building palaces and laying out of pleasure-grounds, in his mode of living, and in his continual wars, exhausted the national resources, and laid the foundation of that misery and discontent which broke out in the Revolution of 1789. Till the present hour, France has not recovered from the deplorable prostration of morals and pecuniary exhaustion produced through his efforts. Such was Louis le Grand—one of the greatest and one of the worst monarchs of whom modern history gives us a description.

STORY OF A PARISH BOY.

GEORGE DALE was an orphan boy left in infancy to the charge of a parish in Nottinghamshire. His mother had not survived his birth, and his remaining parent, a poor but honest man, had soon followed her to the grave. In his early days, accordingly, George had a taste of all the comforts and discomforts attending a life dependent on public beneficence. But fortune was kinder to him than it is to the generality of youngsters in the same circumstances. A lady of the neighbourhood, the widow of a respectable landed proprietor, chanced to see the boy in the course of her charitable visitations, and was struck by his fine, cheerful, healthy looks. Mrs Blakely had lost several of her own children, and her anxiety for the two yet remaining predisposed her to feel an interest in other children of a similar age. Such was the effect, at least, of her situation, operating upon a kindly and generous heart. She had, besides, thought of training up some boy to be a companion and attendant upon her own son, and the sight of George Dale determined her upon making choice of him for this purpose. Her charitable feelings were thus at once gratified, and a desirable object attained.

When George Dale removed to Blakely Hall, he became, as had been intended, the attendant and companion of Frank Blakely, a boy of his own age; and also of Harriet Blakely, a girl about two years younger, or nearly five years old. Not only did George participate in the sports of these children, but he was also fortunate enough to partake, by permission of his kind patroness, in the instructions given to them by their family tutor. He became a great favourite with his young master and mistress — two children whose naturally good qualities had been carefully fostered and improved by an anxious and sensible mother. The hardier early training of the orphan boy, indeed, fitted him admirably for being a useful and agreeable companion to Frank and Harriet in their out-of-door amusements. To gratify their slightest wish, he was ever ready to clamber up any height, to travel any distance, and, in short, to undertake any feat of boyish adventure, however difficult and perilous. At the same time, he profited so much by the advantages afforded to him in the way of education, as to be no unfit or unworthy associate for them in other respects.

The distinction of station between children in their early years is little heeded, and is felt least of all by themselves. They almost reach the age when serious attachments are formed, ere they begin to feel the distinctions of rank. This circumstance, as will be found, materially influenced the fate of the Blakelys and George Dale. The difference between them in point of rank was scarcely seen or felt until Frank reached the age of sixteen, and left home for Eton. Harriet was then left alone. As she was an only daughter, her mother deemed it better to take a personal charge of her education at home than to send her to a boarding-school. Exercise in the open air being an essential part of Mrs Blakely's system of training, Harriet still had to take walks and pony-rides, and still George Dale was for the most part her companion, her mother being unequal to any lengthened excursions abroad. Harriet also had from childhood shewn a great affection for birds, perhaps chiefly because George's boyish adventurousness had enabled her to procure and train numbers of them herself, so fixing her tastes on the subject. Be this as it may, as she grew up she had formed a considerable aviary, to which she went on adding from time to time with George's continued assistance.

Several years ran by, and found the persons of our story in the same relative circumstances, and engaged with the same amusements and occupations. Frank had passed from Eton to Cambridge, presenting himself at Blakely Hall only during the vacation seasons. George Dale, in the meantime, had grown up into a fine young man, handsome in person and intelligent in mind. Mrs Blakely, if she had ever even thought of it, had not found it agreeable to her feelings to make him a common servant. She had placed him in the office of her steward or overseer, and thus supplied him with a respectable occupation, which engaged all his hours excepting those which he still devoted to the promotion of Harriet's amusements, and the gratification of her tastes with respect to the feathered creation. The only disturbance of the peaceful routine of existence at Blakely Hall, occurred when Frank came to spend his vacations there. On one of these occasions, he brought with him a friend of his own age, son of a gentleman of property residing at no great distance. This young collegian was evidently struck with the appearance of Harriet Blakely, who had, indeed, become a lovely young woman. George Dale felt a bitter, and at first an inexplicable pang, as he beheld the place which he had so long held at the bridle-rein of the young lady, taken up by this smart and handsome pupil of the Cambridge Alma; and though he could not help fancying that the change was not pleasing to Harriet herself, he took himself secretly to task upon the subject, and made a firm resolution to crush in its infancy a feeling of whose existence he had previously been unaware. For its presumption and folly he rated himself most severely.

Harriet, of course, shewed her brother her aviary, with its increasing stores. 'Harriet, my dear,' said Frank, 'I am surprised that you have never attempted to tame the wood-pigeon.'

'No, indeed,' was her reply; 'I have never yet thought of it; but this is the very season, and George here'—George was standing beside them at the time—'is so careful of them when young, that we never lose any of our little favourites, and it is really no cruelty for us to take them away.'

'There is a nest of wood-pigeons at this moment,' said George, 'upon the single old pine-tree at the north edge of the park. It will be an easy matter to procure a pair of young birds for Miss Harriet.'

Harriet looked down, and was thoughtful a moment. 'No,' said she at length, 'I do not think that we could ever tame them. George, you need not take any trouble about it. That tree—I think I know it—is a branchless and dangerous one.'

No farther conversation passed upon the subject, as the college chum of Frank then came and joined his friend and friend's sister, and the whole three set off on an excursion. George followed them with his eyes as long as they were visible. 'Miss Harriet does wish to have these birds, and she shall have them,' thought he to himself, as he slowly turned away from the spot.

Early on the ensuing morning, George Dale was at the spot frequented by wood-pigeons; and what was the result of that visit was discovered by another person shortly afterwards. Harriet Blakely, whether from the consciousness that she had never expressed a wish which George did not attempt to gratify, or from some other motive, directed her steps, on that very morning, to the same spot. As she approached it, a young wood-pigeon crept across the path, almost at her feet. A flutter of pleased surprise agitated her breast, as she hastened to lift, but with tender hands, the poor little creature. 'How fortunate!' thought she; 'there will be no occasion now for taking any risk about these birds.' She little knew at what cost the young bird had been brought down from its nest; but she soon learned the truth. Approaching the tree, she saw with horror the form of George Dale stretched apparently lifeless at the foot of its trunk, with a thick but rotten branch by his side, telling too plainly the story of his fall. The young lady rushed in an agony of alarm to his side. All was forgotten by her at that moment but the spectacle before her. Feelings, long concealed, almost unrecognised by herself, found then instantaneous vent. 'George! dear, dear George !' exclaimed she, raising his head, and pressing her lips repeatedly to his pale brow : ' O Heaven, he has killed himself to serve me !—to gratify a trifling wish of mine ! I shall die also—I cannot live after him ! George, dear George, speak to me !'

In this manner did the young lady express the wild and agonised feelings with which she beheld the condition of the companion of her childhood. Ere long, he regained his senses, for he had but swooned through pain, his shoulder being dislocated by his fall ; and he recovered in time to become fully aware of the secret of Harriet's heart, disclosed in the moments of her distress. At first, he felt as if he could have borne all the pain of his accident, and have again shut his eyes, to hear her voice and her expressions a little longer ; but his better nature regained the ascendancy, and even in that moment he called to mind his own station and hers. He roused himself, to assure her that his hurt was comparatively slight, and that if he could but get a little assistance, he would be able to walk home. At first, she would have had him to lean upon her own arm for support, but at length, directed by him, she went to the nearest cottage for other assistance. She soon returned with two or three of the cottagers, but it was with a quieter step, and with a cheek coloured by reflection on the events of the past half-hour.

George Dale was carried home, and for some time afterwards was confined through the consequences of his accident. While he was in these circumstances, the Blakelys were very kind to him, as indeed all of them had ever been. It was at that period, too, that from conversations with Frank and others who visited his sick couch, he learned something which interested him deeply. The young gentleman who had visited Blakely Hall with Frank, having gone home and received his father's sanction, returned to the Hall, and proposed for the hand of Harriet. To the surprise, and also to the regret of her mother and brother, who thought the match an excellent one, the suitor being of good character, and heir to an extensive estate, Harriet gave him a decided refusal, and, in place of any satisfactory explanation, made matters worse by begging her brother and Mrs Blakely never again to entertain any thoughts of marriage for her in future. When George Dale heard of this, and listened to the confidential regrets of Frank upon the subject, a struggle took place in his bosom. After what had passed on the morning of his accident, he could not but feel and believe that Harriet loved himself. The thought excited a mixture of emotions, but the mental contention within ended in a firm resolve to sacrifice everything for the peace of the family to which he owed so much. He determined to quit Blakely Hall; and, as he could not quit it without giving a reason, he resolved to explain the true cause to Frank, only hinting at that as a suspicion, which he himself was almost inclined to think a certainty.

As soon as he had recovered from his illness, he sought an interview with Frank, and made his intended communication. Young Blakely was much affected by the disinterested integrity of his early playmate. ‘Would to Heaven, George,’ said he, ‘that you were her equal in station, or anything near to it! I could not desire her happiness to be in better hands. But as it is, the thing is out of the question. You have done rightly, and nobly!’

‘But you shall not lose by it,’ continued Frank: ‘if I, if my friends, have the slightest influence in the world, you shall not lose by your conduct.’

Frank Blakely did not forget his promise. He exerted himself so earnestly with the member for the county, that a situation in one of the public offices was procured for George Dale, and, to enter on it, he quitted Blakely Hall. For the next five years, his career was a most prosperous one, and deservedly so; for his industry was unremitting, and his talents of no mean order. At the end of the period mentioned, the steps which he had ascended one by one had brought him into possession of a very handsome income, and given him a respectable and gentlemanly station in the world. During the interval following his departure from Blakely Hall, he had heard nothing of its inmates, excepting that Mrs Blakely, his kind patroness, had died. In what condition Harriet was, whether single or wedded, he had not learned. But he himself had not forgotten the past, and it was therefore with an anxious and fluttering heart that he perused a letter, which at length came to him from Frank Blakely, inviting him to visit the Hall as a guest and friend. The note was brief, and entered into no particulars. George lost as little time as possible in accepting the invitation, and speedily followed up that acceptance by presenting himself at the gates of the well-known abode of his youth.

He was received in the first instance by Frank alone, and the latter entered at once into a conversation most interesting to his guest.

'My dear George, Harriet is yet unmarried. She has refused all offers since you left us, in so decided a way, that I have at last become convinced that she either resolutely prefers the unmarried state, or still clings to the remembrance of yourself. The subject is a delicate one, and I have had no explanations with her; but I must tell you, that she constantly expresses a wish to remain single, and, as she is quite cheerful, though not very gay, she may in this speak the truth. But you are now in a respectable position in life, and were you even in one less so, I could not see my only sister's chance of earthly happiness, if it does depend on a union with you, thrown away. I learned that you were still unmarried, and now you have my full sanction in addressing Harriet, if you choose it. But be not too confident: I tell you again that she ever expresses a wish to remain single.'

George thanked his young patron most warmly, and confessed that the feelings which had made his former position most trying, were still predominant in his breast.

George and Harriet were left to themselves for some moments that evening, and then was seen another proof of the wide applicability of Benedict's reasoning—'When I said I would die single, I did not think I should live till I were married.' Harriet Blakely had had much the same meaning in her declarations. George Dale had been her first and only love. Thrown into his society in childhood, she had loved him ere she knew what distinctions of rank were, or at least before she could appreciate them. When George made the offer of his heart and hand, she accepted it with a blushing joy, proportioned to its unexpectedness. So ends our story. It hath a moral, or rather a double moral. It tells parents, in the first instance, that if they would not have the young to form connections out of their station, they must guard against opportunities being given for it, and remember that there is a sort of free-masonry in youth, which takes no cognisance of social inequalities. Ere the consciousness of these is acquired, the affections may be irrevocably engaged. But our little story has also a more pleasing moral; for we find in it self-command, disinterestedness, and high principle displayed under the most trying circumstances, and in the long-run rewarded in the most appropriate manner—namely, by the prize which had been so nobly rejected, when it could not be accepted with honour.*

THE DROP OF DEW.

BY ANDREW MARVELL.—(1620-1678.)

SEE how the orient dew,
 Shed from the bosom of the morn,
 Into the blowing roses,
 Yet careless of its mansion new,
 For the clear region where 'twas born,

* The reader will find the outline of this true story in the Lounger's Commonplace Book.

Round in itself encloses :
 And in its little globe's extent,
 Frames as it can its native element.
 How it the purple flower does slight !
     Scarce touching where it lies ;
     But gazing back upon the skies,
 Shines with a mournful light,
     Like its own tear,
 Because so long divided from the sphere.
Restless it rolls and insecure,
Trembling lest it grow impure,
 Till the warm sun pities its pain,
 And to the skies exhales it back again.

So the soul, that drop, that ray
 Of the clear fountain of eternal day,
 Could it within the human flower be seen,
 Remembering still its former height,
 Shuns the sweet leaves and blossoms green ;
 And recollecting its own light,
 Does in its pure and circling thoughts express
 The greater heaven in an heaven less.
 In how coy a figure wound,
     Every way it turns away ;
 So the world excluding round,
     Yet receiving in the day ;
 Dark beneath, but bright above,
 Here disdaining, there in love :
 How loose and easy hence to go !
 How girt and ready to ascend !
 Moving but on a point below,
 It all about does upwards bend.
 Such did the manna's sacred dew distil,
 White and entire although congealed and chill ;
 Congealed on earth ; but does dissolving run Into the glories of the Almighty sun.

ORIGINAL STORY OF KING LEAR.

THE world has long been aware that Shakspeare, transcendent as were his powers both of invention and execution, contented himself in the case of nearly the whole of his plays, with adopting the plots presented to him by the historians, romancers, and dramatists of preceding days. More particularly did he adhere to truth in his historical compositions, the very words of the old chroniclers being frequently used by him, with only such alterations as were necessary to cast them into blank verse. This fact, properly viewed, ought only to add to our estimation of the poet, indicating his consciousness that art could never excel nature, nor the human fancy conceive imaginary events and language more fit to ‘purge the soul by pity and by terror,’ or more provocative of laughter, than the realities disclosed in the authentic annals of our kind.

Geoffrey of Monmouth, it is usually supposed, told for the first time the story of King Llyr and his daughters, on which Shakspeare based the inimitable tragedy of Lear. It is related, however, in a Welsh manuscript history of earlier date, entitled the Chronicle of the Kings, and written by a bishop of Wales named Tysilio. This work was composed at the close of the seventh century, and several copies of it are in existence. It thus tells the story of Llyr, or Lear, the eleventh king, according to the account, of Britain—a term then confined in a great measure to Wales:—

‘After Bleiddud came Llyr, his son, to be king, and he governed in peace and tranquillity for five-and-twenty years; and he built a city upon the river Soram, which he called Caer Llyr, and in another language, Leir Cestyr.*

* Most probably Leicester, which Nennius, in his Historia Brittonum, calls Caer Lleirou—a name not unlike the one here used.

And he had no son, but three daughters, whose names were Goronilla, Regan, and Cordeilla;* and their father had excessive fondness for them, yet he loved the youngest daughter more than the other two. Thereupon, he considered how he might leave his dominions amongst his daughters after him. Wherefore he designed to prove which of his daughters loved him the most in particular, so that he might bestow upon that one the best part of the island. And he called to him Goronilla, his eldest daughter, and asked her how much she loved her father. Whereupon, she swore to heaven, and to the earth, that she loved her father dearer than she loved her own soul; and he believed, then, that this was true, and bequeathed to her the third part of the island, and the man she should most prefer in the isle of Britain to be her husband. After that he called to him Regan, his second daughter, and asked her how much she loved her father; and she, too, swore by the powers of heaven and earth, that she could not, by her tongue, declare how much she loved her father. He then believed this to be the truth, and left to her the third part of the isle of Britain, together with the man she should choose in the island for her husband. And then he called to him Cordeilla, his youngest daughter, and whom he loved the most of all, and he asked her how much she loved her father—to which she answered: “I do not think there is a daughter who loves a father more than she ought; and I have loved thee through life as a father, and will love thee still. And, sir, if thou must know how much thou art loved, it is according to the extent of thy power, and thy prosperity, and thy courage.” And thereat he was moved with anger, and said: “Since it is thus that thou hast despised my old age, so as not to love me equally with thy sisters, I will adjudge thee to have no share of the isle of Britain.” Thereupon, without delay, he gave to his two eldest daughters the two princes—namely, the Prince of Cornwall and that of Scotland *— and half the kingdom with them, whilst the king lived ; and after his death, the island in two parts between them. And when the rumour of this was spread over the face of the countries, Aganippus, king of France, heard of the wisdom of Cordeilla, and of her form and beauty ; he therefore sent ambassadors to the isle of Britain, to demand of the king Cordeilla, his daughter, to be his wife. And he promised her, and declared to the ambassadors, that he should not have any territory or other wealth with her from the isle of Britain. And Aganippus said, that he was not in want of his territory or his riches, but of his noble and illustrious daughter, to beget of her honourable heirs ; but there was no delay before Aganippus took the maid in marriage, and no one in that age beheld a maid so fair and so wise as she.

‘ After a length of time had elapsed, and Llyr was beginning to be feeble from age, his sons-in-law came with his two daughters, and subdued the island from one sea to the other, and they divided the island and the government between them two. This was after the deluge, 1460 years. Thereupon Maglon, Prince of Scotland, took the king to him, with forty knights in his train, to be maintained at his own charge. But two years were scarcely concluded, before Goronilla grew displeased on account of her father’s retinue ; and she came to him, and desired that he would dismiss the whole of such retinue except twenty knights, observing, that that number was sufficient for a person who was not concerned in wars or any weighty affairs. Thereupon, Llyr became enraged with his daughter for slighting him to such a degree, and he quitted the court of Maglon, and repaired to that of Henwyn, Prince of Cornwall, expecting to have his dignity and rank better supported there than in the court of Maglon. And Henwyn received him joyfully, and treated him honourably, as he ought. But a year and a month had not quite elapsed before Regan, his daughter, grew angry with him on account of the greatness of his train, and desired him to send away the whole thereof, except five knights, and declared that she would maintain only so many in his retinue, and which she deemed sufficient. After he had been obliged to dismiss his knights, he became grieved for the loss of his former dignity, and he returned a second time to his eldest daughter, expecting that she would have compassion on him, and would preserve him his dignity. But she declared, that she would maintain only one knight with him, and that was enough for her to do, as the knights of her lord were at his command. Finding he could obtain nothing by his entreaties, he sent away all his knights excepting one, who continued with him. Then, after meditating upon his former rank, which he had lost, he became oppressed with cares, and sorrowful almost unto death. The words of his daughters and their professions came upon his mind, and thereupon he knew that what was said to him by Cordeilla his daughter was true ; and according to his prosperity, his power, and his courage, would he be beloved.

' On this he bethought himself that he would visit Cordeilla his daughter, to implore her mercy, and to see if he could obtain any kind of assistance from her towards recovering his dominion. And after he had gone off to sea with three attendants, bewailing his affliction and wretchedness, he exclaimed, with weeping and groaning, after this manner :—“ O heavens ! why did you exalt me to the summit of honour, since it is more painful to remember honour after it is lost, than to suffer want without the experience of prosperity ! Gods of heaven and earth ! let the time yet arrive when I may be able to retaliate upon the persons who have reduced me to this distress. Ah, Cordeilla ! my beloved daughter, how truly didst thou say to me—as my power, and my possessions, and my wealth might be, so should I be respected ; and for what thou didst speak I became offended with thee. Oh, my beloved daughter! in what way shall I be able, for shame, to approach thee now, after having suffered thee to go away from the isle of Britain so destitute as I have done?" Continuing to lament his pain and wretchedness in this manner, he came near to Paris, the city wherein his daughter was; and he sent a messenger to her, to announce that he was coming, a poor weak, afflicted man, to implore her mercy to see her. When she heard this, she wept, and inquired how many knights there were with him. The messenger declared there was but one squire: she then wept more bitterly than before, and sent him gold and silver, desiring that he should go privately as far as Amiad,* or to some other city that he might think proper—to take perfumes, and baths, and precious ornaments, and to change his condition, his ornaments and garments, and to take with him forty knights, in the same dress as himself. And when they should be completed and ready, he was to send a messenger to Aganippus, king of France, to announce to him his coming, after having been disgracefully expelled, by his two sons-in-law, from the isle of Britain; and to implore his aid to regain possession of his dominions.

'All that did Llyr do, as Cordeilla his daughter had desired him. And when the messenger came to announce to the king that Llyr was coming to have an interview with him, he was rejoiced; and he came to meet him with a fair and splendid retinue to a great distance from the city, proceeding till Llyr met him; and thereupon they alighted, and embraced affectionately, and proceeded to Paris. And there they dwelt together for a long time happily and joyfully. When the disgrace of Llyr in the isle of Britain was told to Aganippus, he was greatly affected; and thereupon it was agreed in council, to assemble the armies of France, and to subdue the island again. And then Aganippus gave the government of France to Llyr, whilst he should be assembling the remote parts. When their forces and necessaries were ready, it was agreed in council to send Cordeilla with Llyr, lest the French should not be obedient to Llyr. And Aganippus commended the French, as they valued their souls, and at their peril, to be as obedient to Llyr and to his daughter as they would be to himself.

'When they had taken leave, they set off towards the isle of Britain ; and against them came Maglon, Prince of Scotland, and Henwyn, Prince of Cornwall, with all their power, and fought gallantly and severely with them ; but owing to the French being so numerous, it did not avail them, for they were put to flight, and pursued, and a multitude of them slain ; and Llyr and his daughter subdued the island before the end of the year from one sea to another, and chased his two sons-in-law away out of the island.

'And after the isle of Britain had been conquered by Llyr, a messenger came from France to inform Cordeilla of the death of Aganippus ; and she took that very heavily to heart, and from thenceforth she preferred dwelling in the isle of Britain with her father, than return to France on her dowry. Whereupon, after they had reduced the island to them, they governed it for a long time in peace and quietness until Llyr died. And after his death, he was honourably buried in a temple which he had himself built in Caer Llyr, under the river Soram, to the honour of some god who was called Janus Bisrons. And upon the festival of that temple, all the craftsmen of the city used to come to honour it, and then they would begin every work that was to be taken in hand to the conclusion of the year.

'After the decease of Llyr, Cordeilla took the government of the isle of Britain, and she managed it for five years in peace and tranquillity ; and in the sixth year rose her two nephews, sons of her sisters, who were young men of great fame—namely, Margan, the son of Maglon, Prince of Scotland ; and Cunedda, the son of Henwyn, Prince of Cornwall. And they assembled an army, and made war on Cordeilla ; and after frequent conflicts between them, they subdued the island, and took her and confined her in prison. And when she thought of her former grandeur which she had lost, and there remained no hopes that she should be again restored, out of excessive anguish she killed herself, which was done by stabbing herself with a knife under her breast, so that she lost her soul. And thereupon it was adjudged that it was the foulest death of any for a person to kill himself. This happened a thousand and five hundred years after the deluge.'

TALE OF EUGENE ARAM.

IN the year 1758, a man digging for limestone, near a place called St Robert's Cave, in the parish of Knaresborough, county of York, found the bones of a human body. Suspecting these to be the remains of some one who had been murdered, he gave information of his discovery in the town of Knaresborough, where the people, thrown into great excitement by the intelligence, endeavoured to recollect if any one had of late years been missed from that neighbourhood. It was remembered by a particular individual, that one Daniel Clarke, a shoemaker, had disappeared about thirteen years before, and had never again been heard of. On further inquiry, it was ascertained that he had disappeared under circumstances which occasioned a suspicion of his having acted fraudulently. He had borrowed a considerable quantity of plate, under pretence of being commissioned to collect that article for exportation. Being then just married, he had also borrowed some articles of household furniture and wearing apparel, for the purpose, as he pretended, of giving an entertainment to his friends. After his disappearance, two persons, named Houseman and Aram, were suspected of having aided him in the fraud. Their houses were searched, and some of the miscellaneous articles found, but no plate, which it was then supposed that Clarke must have made off with; and thus the matter ended. It was now recollected that the wife of Aram, who was subsequently deserted by him, had said to some one that she knew what would peril the life of her husband, and of some other persons. An inquest being held upon the skeleton, all these circumstances were brought forward as evidence.

To this inquest the coroner summoned Richard Houseman, one of the individuals suspected at the time of having assisted Clarke in his fraud. This man entered the room in a state of great agitation, and with strong marks of fear in his countenance and voice. Taking up one of the bones, he used the remarkable expression: 'This is no more Dan Clarke's bone than it is mine;' which convinced the jury that he knew something more about the matter. He was ultimately prevailed on to acknowledge that he was privy to the murder of Clarke, and that his bones were buried in St Robert's Cave, not far from the place where those now before the jury had been found. On a search being made, the bones were found exactly in the place and posture which he described. He stated the actual murderer to be his former friend Eugene Aram, who now acted as usher in the school of Lynn, in Norfolk. A warrant was immediately sent off for the apprehension of Aram, who was found peacefully engaged in his ordinary business. The profession of this man, his mature age, and the reputation which he bore for great learning, conspired to render his apprehension as a murderer a matter of the greatest surprise to the inhabitants of the place where he lived. He at first denied that he had ever been at Knaresborough, or knew Daniel Clarke; but, on the introduction of a person who was acquainted with him at that town, he saw fit to acknowledge his former residence in it.

Eugene Aram was a native of Yorkshire, and connected by birth with some of the families of gentry in that county. The circumstances of his parents are not stated, but he appears to have entered life in the character of a poor scholar. Having adopted the business of teaching, he devoted himself to the acquisition of knowledge with an ardour equalling that of the most distinguished scholars. After acting as an usher in various situations, he had settled, in 1734, at Knaresborough, where, eleven years after, he committed the crime for which he was now apprehended. By an early and imprudent marriage, he had added to the embarrassment of his circumstances; yet his pursuit of knowledge continued unabated. When we learn that the man who associated with such low persons as Clarke and Houseman, was deeply skilled in the ancient and modern languages, including the Hebrew, Arabic, and Celtic; and was alike conversant in the belles-lettres, in antiquities, and in several branches of modern science, our wonder amounts almost to disbelief; yet there can be no doubt of the fact. He had even, before his apprehension, advanced a great way in a comparative polyglot lexicon, upon a new, and, for that age, profound plan; in which it seems not unlikely that, if it had been carried into effect, he might have anticipated some of the honours of the German philologists. He had also composed several tracts upon British antiquities. In a fiction grounded upon his story, by one of the most delightful of modern novelists, his thirst for knowledge is seized with admirable art as a means of palliating his crime: he is there represented as entering into the base plans of his accomplices, for the purpose of supplying the means of study. But no such motive can be traced in his real story, which simply sets him down as a remarkable example of capacity and talent, degraded and lost through moral infirmity. Yet, even while we execrate the atrocious guilt of Aram, such is the homage we naturally yield to intellectual superiority, such the sympathy we accord to the painful struggles of a mind devoted to knowledge, that he has never been reckoned one of the herd of ordinary criminals. In Caulfield's Portraits, there is a genuine likeness of this singular man—an intellectual but melancholy countenance, forming a touching commentary on his history.

At the trial of Aram, which took place before the York Assizes, on the 3d of August 1759, Richard Houseman was admitted as king's evidence, and gave a minute narration of the murder, slightly distorted, it was supposed, in order to lighten his own share of blame. According to the witness, Clarke had received his wife's fortune, amounting to L.160, on the night before he was murdered. He called at Aram's with this sum in his pocket, and also carrying the plate which he had obtained among his friends. He and Houseman, at the request of Aram, walked out in the direction of St Robert's Cave, where the party had no sooner arrived, than Aram knocked down Clarke and murdered him. Houseman, according to his own account, then retired; but it afterwards appeared that he had assisted in burying the body in the cave. The clothes of the murdered man were brought to Aram's house and burnt, but not without betraying the secret to Mrs Aram. After this, and other evidence had been given, Aram delivered a written defence, in which he endeavoured, by the exercise of much ingenuity and a show of curious learning, to make up for the want of living exculpatory evidence.

'First, my lord, the whole tenor of my conduct in life contradicts every particular of this indictment; yet I had never said this, did not my present circumstances extort it from me, and seem to make it necessary. Permit me here, my lord, to call upon malignity itself, so long and cruelly busied in this prosecution, to charge upon me any immorality, of which prejudice was not the author. No, my lord, I concerted no schemes of fraud, projected no violence, injured no man's person or property. My days were honestly laborious, my nights intensely studious; and I humbly conceive my notice of this, especially at this time, will not be thought impertinent or unseasonable, but at least deserving some attention: because, my lord, that any person, after a temperate use of life, a series of thinking and acting regularly, and without one single deviation from sobriety, should plunge into the very depth of profligacy precipitately and at once, is altogether improbable and unprecedented, and absolutely inconsistent with the course of things. Mankind is never corrupted at once; villainy is always progressive, and declines from right, step by step, till every regard of probity is lost, and every sense of all moral obligation totally perishes.

' Again, my lord, a suspicion of this kind, which nothing but malevolence could entertain, and ignorance propagate, is violently opposed by my very situation at that time with respect to health; for, but a little space before, I had been confined to my bed, and suffered under a very long and severe disorder, and was not able, for half a year together, so much as to walk. The distemper left me indeed, yet slowly and in part; but so macerated, so enfeebled, that I was reduced to crutches, and was so far from being well about the time I am charged with this fact, that I never till this day perfectly recovered. Could, then, a person in this condition take anything into his head so unlikely, so extravagant? I, past the vigour of my age, feeble and valetudinary, with no inducement to engage, no ability to accomplish, no weapon wherewith to perpetrate such a fact; without interest, without power, without motive, without means.

' Besides, it must needs occur to every one that an action of this atrocious nature is never heard of, but, when its springs are laid open it appears that it was to support some indolence, or supply some luxury; to satisfy some avarice, or oblige some malice; to prevent some real or some imaginary want; yet I lay not under the influence of any one of these. Surely, my lord, I may, consistent with both truth and modesty, affirm thus much; and none who have any veracity, and knew me, will ever question this.'

[He then endeavours, by instances, to shew that the disappearance of a man is but an imperfect argument for the supposition of his being dead.]

' Permit me next, my lord, to observe a little upon the bones which have been discovered. It is said, which perhaps is saying very far, that these are the skeleton of a man. It is possible, indeed, they may; but is there any certain known criterion which incontestably distinguishes the sex in human bones? Let it be considered, my lord, whether the ascertaining of this point ought not to precede any attempt to identify them.

'The place of their depositum, too, claims much more attention than is commonly bestowed upon it; for of all places in the world, none could have mentioned any one, wherein there was greater certainty of finding human bones, than a hermitage, except he should point out a church-yard: hermitages, in time past, being not only places of religious retirement, but of burial too. And it has scarcely ever been heard of, but that every cell now known contains, or contained, these relics of humanity; some mutilated, and some entire. I do not inform, but give me leave to remind your lordship, that here sat solitary sanctity, and here the hermit, or the anchoress, hoped that repose for their bones, when dead, they here enjoyed when living.

'1. The bones, as was supposed, of the Saxon St Dubritius, were discovered buried in his cell at Guy's Cliff, near Warwick, as appears from the authority of Sir William Dugdale.

'2. The bones thought to be those of the anchoress of Rosia, were but lately discovered in a cell at Royston, entire, fair, and undecayed, though they must have lain interred for several centuries, as is proved by Dr Stukeley.

'3. But our own county—nay, almost this neighbourhood—supplies another instance; for in January 1747, were found by Mr Stovin, accompanied by a reverend gentleman, the bones in part of some recluse, in the cell at Lindholm, near Hatfield. They were believed to be those of William of Lindholm, a hermit, who had long made this cave his habitation.

'4. In February 1744, part of Woburn Abbey being pulled down, a large portion of a corpse appeared, even with the flesh on, and which bore cutting with a knife;

though it is certain this had lain above two hundred years, and how much longer is doubtful; for this abbey was founded in 1145, and dissolved in 1538 or 1539.

‘What would have been said, what believed, if this had been an accident to the bones in question?

‘Further, my lord, it is not yet out of living memory, that a little distance from Knaresborough, in a field, part of the manor of the worthy and patriotic baronet who does that borough the honour to represent it in parliament, were found, in digging for gravel, not one human skeleton only, but five or six, deposited side by side, with each an urn placed on its head, as your lordship knows was usual in ancient interments.

‘About the same time, and in another field almost close to this borough, was discovered, also in searching for gravel, another human skeleton; but the piety of the same worthy gentleman ordered both pits to be filled up again, commendably unwilling to disturb the dead.

‘Is the invention of these bones forgotten, then, or industriously concealed, that the discovery of those in question may appear the more singular and extraordinary? whereas, in fact, there is nothing extraordinary in it. My lord, almost every place conceals such remains. In fields, in hills, in highway-sides, in commons, lie frequent and unsuspected bones; and our present allotment of rest for the departed is but of some centuries.

‘Another particular seems not to claim a little of your lordship’s notice, and that of the gentlemen of the jury; which is, that perhaps no example occurs of more than one skeleton being found in one cell; and in the cell in question was found but one; agreeable in this to the peculiarity of every other known cell in Britain. Not the invention of one skeleton, then, but of two, would have appeared suspicious and uncommon.

‘But it seems another skeleton has been discovered by some labourer, which was full as confidently averred to be Clarke’s as this. My lord, must some of the living, if it promotes some interest, be made answerable for all the bones that earth has concealed, or chance exposed? And might not a place where bones lay be mentioned by a person by chance, as well as found by a labourer by chance? Or, is it more criminal accidentally to name where bones lie, than accidentally to find where they lie?

[He then adverts to the damage found to have been inflicted upon the skull, which he shews might have been occasioned in the course of the ravages committed at the Reformation.]

‘Moreover, what gentleman here is ignorant that Knaresborough had a castle, which, though now run to ruin, was once considerable both for its strength and garrison? All know it was vigorously besieged by the arms of the Parliament; at which siege, in sallies, conflicts, flights, pursuits, many fell in all the places round it, and where they fell, were buried; for every place, my lord, is burial-earth in war; and many, questionless, of these rest yet unknown, whose bones futurity shall discover.

‘I hope, with all imaginable submission, that what has been said will not be thought impertinent to this indictment; and that it will be far from the wisdom, the learning, and the integrity of this place, to impute to the living what zeal in its fury may have done; what nature may have taken off, and piety interred; or what war alone may have destroyed, alone deposited.

‘As to the circumstances that have been raked together, I have nothing to observe; but that all circumstances whatsoever are precarious, and have been but too frequently found lamentably fallible: even the strongest have failed. They may rise to the utmost degree of probability, yet are they but probability still. Why need I name to your lordship the two Harrisons recorded in Dr Howel, who both suffered upon circumstances, because of the sudden disappearance of their lodger, who was in credit, had contracted debts, borrowed money, and went off unseen, and returned again a great many years after their execution? Why name the intricate affairs of Jacques de Moulin, under King Charles II., related by a gentleman who was counsel for the crown? And why the unhappy Coleman, who suffered innocent, though convicted upon positive evidence; and whose children perished for want, because the world uncharitably believed the father guilty? Why mention the perjury of Smith, incautiously admitted king's evidence; who, to screen himself, equally accused Faircloth and Loveday of the murder of Dun; the first of whom, in 1749, was executed at Winchester; and Loveday was about to suffer at Reading, had not Smith been proved perjured, to the satisfaction of the court, by the surgeon of the Gosport Hospital?

'Now, my lord, having endeavoured to shew that the whole of this process is altogether repugnant to every part of my life; that it is inconsistent with my condition of health about that time; that no rational inference can be drawn that a person is dead who suddenly disappears; that hermitages were the constant repositories of the bones of the recluse; that the proofs of this are well authenticated; that the revolutions in religion, or the fortune of war, have mangled, or buried, the dead; the conclusion remains, perhaps, no less reasonably than impatiently wished for. I, last, after a year's confinement, equal to either fortune, put myself upon the candour, the justice, and the humanity of your lordship, and upon yours, my countrymen, gentlemen of the jury.'

Notwithstanding this elaborate but specious defence, the guilt of Aram was too clear to admit of doubt, and he accordingly received sentence of death. He afterwards confessed the crime to the clergyman appointed to attend him, but ascribed it to the passion of jealousy. On the morning of his execution, he was found almost dead in bed, in consequence of a wound which he had inflicted upon his arm with a razor; a paper in which he attempted a justification of suicide, being found upon the table by his side. His body, after execution, was exposed in chains at the scene of his guilt,

THE SCOTTS OF BUCCLEUCH.

THE lonely estate of Buccleuch, from which the noble family of Scott has derived its title, is situated in a remote part of the district of Ettrick, in Selkirkshire, and whatever was its former condition, now hardly contains a single human habitation. Scott of Satchells, in his True History of the Right Honourable Name of Scott, gives the following romantic origin of the chief family and name :—Two brethren, natives of Galloway, having been banished from that country for a riot, or insurrection, came to Rankelburn, in Ettrick Forest, where the keeper, whose name was Brydone, received them joyfully, on account of their skill in winding the horn, and in the other mysteries of the chase. Kenneth Mac-Alpin, then king of Scotland, came soon after to hunt in the royal forest, and pursued a buck from Ettrick-heugh to the glen now called Buckleuch, about two miles above the junction of Rankelburn with the river Ettrick. Here the stag stood at bay ; and the king and his attendants, who followed on horseback, were thrown out by the steepness of the hill and the morass. John, one of the brethren from Galloway, had followed the chase on foot ; and now coming in, seized the buck by the horns, and, being a man of great strength and activity, threw him on his back, and ran with his burden about a mile up the steep hill, to a place called Cracra-Cross, where Kenneth had halted, and laid the buck at the sovereign's feet. According to Watt's Bellanden—

‘ The deer being curee'd in that place,
At his majesty's demand,
Then John of Galloway ran apace,
And fetched water to his hand.
The king did wash into a dish,
And Galloway John he wot ;
He said : “ Thy name now after this Shall ever be called John Scott.

" The forest, and the deer therein,
We commit to thy hand ;
For thou shalt sure the ranger be,
If thou obey command :
And for the buck thou stoutly brought
To us up that steep heuch, Thy designation ever shall Be John Scott in Bucksleuch."

As the whole of this story is founded on legendary tradition, it cannot now be certified. Agreeably to historical accuracy, the surname of Scott does not come into notice in the chartularies till the twelfth century, about 300 years after the date of the traditional event ; but when it is first mentioned, it appears to have belonged to the family of Buccleuch, at the time in the south and west, and that of Balweary, in Fife. The first heads of the house of Buccleuch seem to have been military adventurers with small properties, acquired by marriage, or grant for good services. The sixth in the main line of the genealogical tree was Sir Walter Scott, a chieftain who possessed the estate of Murdockston, in Lanarkshire, some property in Peeblesshire, and the lands of Buccleuch, in Selkirkshire. Finding his Lanarkshire property in a situation so peaceful that nothing could be done in the way of marauding, he exchanged it, in 1446, for Branxholm, in Teviotdale ; and it is said, that after the bargain was completed, he drily observed, that, although he might suffer by his new neighbourhood to the Borders, ' the Cumberland cattle were as good as those of Teviotdale.' From this period, the Scotts of Buccleuch rose into eminence and wealth. Sir Walter having exerted himself in suppressing the rebellion of the Douglasses in 1455, James II. conferred on him a grant of some of their lands ; and by these and other means, he rose high on the ruin of that powerful family. During the early part of the sixteenth century, the clan Scott figured in all the disturbances and wars on the Borders, along with the Elliots and Armstrongs ; their depredations on the property of the English residents being countenanced by Buccleuch, Maxwell, and other heads of families. At length, reprisals followed ; the Earl of Northumberland entered Scotland, ravaged the middle marches, and burned Branxholm, the abode of Buccleuch, situated a short way from Hawick. The war between England and Scotland, which commenced in 1542, and lasted till the year 1551, was severely felt by the Scotts and other Borderers, who, however, with the aid of French auxiliaries, finally overcame their assailants, and made themselves once more masters of the fastnesses which they had lost. After the peace of 1551, the Scottish chieftains who had distinguished themselves during the late troubles, received the honour of knighthood. These were the Lairds of Buccleuch, Cessford, Fairnihirst, Littleden, Greenhead, and Cowdenknows. Buccleuch, whose exploits are celebrated in traditional lore, did not long enjoy his new honours. He was slain in the streets of Edinburgh, by his hereditary enemies the Kerrs, in 1552.

In the person of Sir Walter Scott, the thirteenth head of the house, the family rose to the rank of a lordship. He lived in the reign of James VI., and was employed to suppress the system of rapine which had been so long carried on upon the Borders. Finding, however, that this was no easy matter, he fell upon the ingenious device of drawing off the most desperate of the tribes into foreign war ; and for thus freeing the country of troublesome subjects, he was created Lord Scott of Buccleuch in 1608. Walter, his son, was elevated to an earldom in 1619 ; and through his son Francis, the second earl, the family, by a grant, acquired the extensive domain of Liddisdale, formerly belonging to the house of Bothwell ; also, by purchase, large territories in Eskdale ; and, in 1642, the valuable barony of Dalkeith, from the Morton family. Being thus prepared for the highest rank in the peerage, a new era opened in the family history. Francis left only two daughters, the eldest of whom dying without issue, the titles and estates went to her sister Anne, who had been born in the town of Dundee, at a time when many of the nobility and gentry took refuge in that place in dread of the warfare of Cromwell. In 1663, she was married to James Duke of Monmouth, son of Charles II., by Lucy, daughter of Richard Walter of Haverfordwest, Pembrokeshire, and who was thereupon created Duke of Buccleuch. After a marriage of twenty-two years, her unhappy husband, as the readers of history well knew, fell a victim to his uncle James VII. He was beheaded in 1685, leaving his duchess with a family of four sons and two daughters. She afterwards married Lord Cornwallis, by whom she had a son and two daughters, and died in 1732, at her seat of Dalkeith House, where she had occasionally resided in a style of princely splendour. James, her eldest surviving son by the Duke of Monmouth, was entitled Earl of Dalkeith ; and he dying in 1705, his son Francis, by the death of his grandmother, succeeded to the title of Duke of Buccleuch, 1732. Notwithstanding the connection with the son of Charles II., the family still preserved the surname of Scott. The above Francis, in 1743, received two of his grandfather's (Monmouth's) titles—namely, Earl of Doncaster, and Baron Tynedale, and was hence a British peer. His Grace, in 1720, married a daughter of James, second Duke of Queensberry, and by this fortunate connection the present Duke of Buccleuch enjoys the estates and titles of the Queensberry family.

The grandson of this personage, Henry, third Duke of Buccleuch, was the greatest and most estimable of his family. With a judicious knowledge, implanted by his friend and tutor Dr Adam Smith, his beneficent talents were directed to other purposes than those which engaged the greater part of the aristocracy of his time. He entered into possession of the most extensive landed property in the south of Scotland, for the improvement of which he adopted the most spirited and wise measures. The melioration of the soil, the planting of trees, the cutting of roads, the improving of the breed of sheep, and the elevation of the condition of the tenantry on his vast estates, uniformly engaged his attention. He was also active in raising a regiment of fencibles, at the beginning of the French war, and was a zealous supporter of the British government. In 1767, he married Lady Elizabeth Montagu, only daughter and heiress of George Duke of Montagu, Earl of Cardigan, by which alliance one of his sons became heir to the Duke of Montagu, but, by limitation of the patent, was only styled Lord Montagu. The grandson of his Grace, Walter Francis, born 1806, is at present Duke of Buccleuch, and possessor of the extensive family domains in the counties of Edinburgh, Selkirk, Roxburgh, Dumfries, and other places. The principal seat of the family is at Dalkeith House, a mansion founded on the ruins of a castle of considerable antiquity, and recommended by its proximity to Edinburgh, and the beauty of its environs.

The supporters of the arms of the Buccleuch family, now two ladies, were formerly a hound and a buck, or, according to the old terms, a hart of leash and a hart of grease. In the shield, there was formerly a hunting-horn, a symbol of the origin of the race, long retained by Scott of Howpasley and Thirlstane. It is said the motto was, Best riding by moonlight, in allusion to the moss-trooping habits of the founders of the family. The modern motto is Amo, which applies to the female supporters.

AN ABSENTEE HUSBAND.

IN a work now little heard of, Dr King's Anecdotes of his Own Times, there is presented an account of an eccentric person, who cherished an odd desire of secret watchfulness over his own family, and which must be considered a species of mental hallucination. The following is this strange narrative :—

About the year 1706, I knew one Mr Howe, a sensible, well-natured man, possessed of an estate of L.700 or L.800 per annum. He married a young lady of a good family in the west of England; her maiden name was Mallet:

she was agreeable in her person and manners, and proved a very good wife. Seven or eight years after they had been married, he rose one morning very early, and told his wife he was obliged to go to the Tower, to transact some particular business: the same day, at noon, his wife received a note from him, in which he informed her, that he was under a necessity of going to Holland, and should probably be absent three weeks or a month. He was absent from her seventeen years, during which time she neither heard from him nor of him. The evening before he returned, whilst she was at supper, and with her some of her friends and relations, particularly one Dr Rose, a physician, who had married her sister, a billet, without any name subscribed, was delivered to her, in which the writer requested the favour of her to give him a meeting the next evening in the Birdcage Walk, in St James's Park. When she had read her billet, she tossed it to Dr Rose, and laughing, ' You see, brother,' said she, ' as old as I am, I have got a gallant.' Rose, who perused the note with more attention, declared it to be Mr Howe's handwriting: this surprised all the company, and so much affected Mrs Howe, that she fainted away. However, she soon recovered, when it was agreed that Dr Rose and his wife, with the other gentlemen and ladies who were then at supper, should attend Mrs Howe the next evening to the Birdcage Walk. They had not been there more than five or six minutes, when Mr Howe came to them, and after saluting his friends, and embracing his wife, walked home with her; and they lived together in great harmony from that time till the day of his death.

But the most curious part of my tale remains to be related. When Howe left his wife, they lived in a house in Jermyn Street, near St James's Church: he went no farther than to a little street in Westminster, where he took a room, for which he paid five or six shillings a week; and changing his name, and disguising himself by wearing a black wig (for he was a fair man), he remained in this habitation during the whole time of his absence. He had had two children by his wife when he departed from her, who were both living at that time ; but they both died young in a few years after. However, during their lives, the second or third year after their father disappeared, Mrs Howe was obliged to apply for an act of parliament, to procure a proper settlement of her husband's estate, and a provision for herself out of it during his absence, as it was uncertain whether he was alive or dead. This act he suffered to be solicited and passed, and enjoyed the pleasure of reading the progress of it in the votes, in a little coffee-house, near his lodging, which he frequented. Upon his quitting his house and family in the manner I have mentioned, Mrs Howe at first imagined, as she could not conceive any other cause for such an abrupt elopement, that he had contracted a large debt unknown to her, and by that means involved himself in difficulties which he could not easily surmount ; and for some days she lived in continual apprehensions of demands from creditors, of seizures, executions, &c. But nothing of this kind happened : on the contrary, he did not only leave his estate quite free and unencumbered, but he paid the bills of every tradesman with whom he had any dealings ; and upon examining his papers, in due time after he was gone, proper receipts and discharges were found from all persons, whether tradesmen or others, with whom he had any manner of transactions or money concerns.

Mrs Howe, after the death of her children, thought proper to lessen her family of servants, and the expenses of her housekeeping, and therefore removed from her house in Jermyn Street to a little house in Brewer Street, near Golden Square. Just over against her lived one Salt, a corn-chandler. About ten years after Howe's abdication, he contrived to make an acquaintance with Salt, and was at length in such a degree of intimacy with him, that he usually dined with Salt once or twice a week. From the room in which they ate, it was not difficult to look into Mrs Howe's dining-room, where she generally sat and received her company ; and Salt, who believed Howe to be a bachelor, frequently recommended his own wife to him as a suitable match. During the last seven years of this gentleman's absence, he went every Sunday to St James's Church, and used to sit in Mr Salt's seat, where he had a view of his wife, but could not easily be seen by her.

After he returned home, he never would confess, even to his most intimate friends, what was the real cause of such a singular conduct: apparently, there was none; but whatever it was, he was certainly ashamed to own it. Dr Rose has often said to me, that he believed his brother Howe would never have returned to his wife, if the money which he took with him, which was supposed to have been £1000 or £2000, had not been all spent: and he must have been a good economist, and frugal in his manner of living, otherwise his money would scarce have held out; for I imagine he had his whole fortune by him, I mean what he carried away with him in money or bank-bills, and daily took out of his bag, like the Spaniard in Gil Blas, what was sufficient for his expenses.

Phrenologists, we fancy, would say that Dr Howe was labouring under the influence of diseased secretiveness—a form of mental malady far from uncommon, but seldom manifested on the scale that has been described.

JOHNSON :

A STORY OF A COUNTRY TOWN.

THE small country town of H——, in which I reside, is a bustling, thriving, little place in the western part of the kingdom. Amongst other evidences of its prosperity, it exhibits an unusual number of respectable shops. Being a small community, we, like all small communities, take sometimes a very great interest in very little matters, especially when of a local nature. It is also said, and cannot well be denied, that we are a little given to scandal. We know what everybody in our little town is about, and everybody canvasses every other body's affairs with the greatest freedom. Yet the old-established inhabitants have a sort of clannish regard for each other, and we do not usually treat any with severity, except strangers who may be endeavouring to obtain a settlement amongst us.

Some years ago, one of our principal shopkeepers died in a state of insolvency, and his shop was shut up, to the great disfigurement of the town, as it occupied a very conspicuous place near its centre. Every one felt concerned at the dulness which its closed windows gave to the street ; but the predominant feeling was curiosity as to who should be its next tenant. On this point, a variety of rumours was set afloat. One day, it was confidently asserted that the shop was taken by a great tea-merchant from the capital ; the next, an extensive haberdasher from an adjacent city was said to be the man. At length, a tenant did appear—a native of England—a mild, gentle-looking man, of somewhat slender form, and about forty years of age. Strange to say, nobody knew or could learn anything about him ; neither whence he came nor what were his means. It was only seen that he opened shop as a tea-merchant and grocer, under the name of Johnson.

The public remained in this ignorance for a few weeks ; but at length a rumour got abroad that Johnson was a person of doubtful character. By and by, specific charges were heard of. It was said that he had once committed an extensive forgery, and only escaped the penalty of the law through the forbearance of the parties whom he had injured. Another charge was, that he had deserted his wife and three children, who were now starving in a remote and obscure village in England. He was also said to be a fraudulent bankrupt, having robbed his creditors to a large amount : he was, lastly, a person destitute of religious principle.

I cannot say that we were much grieved at learning all this of the new-comer, for we had a decided prejudice against him, and would have much preferred seeing his shop occupied by one of the native inhabitants of our burgh. Some went so far as to entertain a decided wish to drive Johnson from amongst us, and with this view, did not scruple to give currency to the scandals which had been raised against him. The consequence of their efforts was, that Johnson obtained no business. Three weeks elapsed from his opening shop, without his being known to have obtained a single customer, except for the most trifling articles.

Curious to know how he felt under the treatment he was receiving, I and another shopkeeper availed ourselves of the opportunity presented by our undertaking to collect subscriptions for the widow—herself dying—and small family of a respectable townsman, a tanner to business, who had died suddenly, and in poor circumstances, in consequence of certain heavy losses he had recently sustained. Provided with this apology—for we had no hope whatever of obtaining a contribution from Johnson—we entered his shop; my friend winking significantly to me as we did so. To our surprise, we were received with the utmost kindness of manner. We had expected blustering hauteur and insolence, from which my companion hoped to derive some amusement. But the very opposite conduct was exhibited, and I must say it threw us out. In order to draw him forth, we asked how he had found business since he came to H——; to which he replied, that he had as yet done nothing, but it was not surprising, as he was wholly a stranger, and no doubt it was natural for every one to prefer old acquaintances. He hoped, however, that by and by, when the people should know him a little better, they would favour him with a share of their custom. ‘And,’ he added with a significant expression, but with the same gentle smile, and the same mild tone, ‘when the good folk here know me a little longer, and consequently a little better, they will, I hope, see cause to change the opinion they have formed of me, and will be sorry, I daresay, for having believed—still more sorry for having taken any share in propagating—the absurd stories about me that have been raised by falsehood and malice.’

My friend and I were confounded both by the matter and manner of these remarks. We clearly enough perceived that Johnson was perfectly aware, not only of the reports that were in circulation against him, but of the share we had had in propagating them. We did not make any reply, but proceeded to the ostensible purpose of our call. We laid the subscription-paper before Mr Johnson, at the same time explaining the circumstances of the case.

Having glanced at the paper, he, without saying a word, went to a little desk at the head of the counter, raised the lid, thrust in his hand, withdrew it, returned to us, and—still without speaking a word—laid a sovereign upon the subscription-paper. It was the largest sum which had yet been contributed by any individual. ‘Poor woman,’ said Johnson, in a voice which, from another, I should have said was that of true compassionate feeling, ‘I trust she will yet recover: I hope she is properly attended to, and that the sum which may be collected will be sufficient to put her in some little way of doing.’

With feelings which I should not find it very easy to describe, I took up Johnson’s contribution, wished him good-morning, and, accompanied by my friend, left the shop. The conduct of the man altogether puzzled us. The gentleness of his manner, and the patience and mildness with which he spoke of his want of success in business, and of those who had traduced him, confounded us. We came to the conclusion that he was, after all, merely a consummate hypocrite, and that there was no doubt he would shortly appear in his true colours.

One forenoon, some little time after, my neighbour, Manson, the person who had accompanied me in my call on Johnson with the subscription-paper, and who had, I must say it, been particularly industrious in spreading the evil reports, called me into his shop, and put a letter into my hands. It was from Johnson. Here it is:—

‘SIR—It is with very sincere regret I have learned that you have been circulating reports highly prejudicial to my character, and utterly ruinous to my interests. This is a very serious charge; but I beg of you to understand, that I do not bring it against you without having sufficient proof of its truth. Such proof I could command as would at once obtain for me large damages in a court of justice. But it is not my intention to adopt such a course with you: I mean rather to appeal to your reason and your better feelings, and to try whether I cannot, by such a proceeding, bring you to a sense of the injustice you have done me.

'I now, sir, make this appeal, and am very sure that a little reflection will point out to you the impropriety of your conduct towards me, and induce you at once to express your regret for it, and to desist from it in time to come. Please to remember, that I have never done you the smallest injury, either by word or deed, either directly or indirectly. Why, then, this unprovoked hostility towards me? Allow me, in conclusion, to say, that it would afford me inexpressible happiness could I by any means induce you to think better of me than you at present do. I would do much, sir, to gain your goodwill, if I might not aspire to your friendship. In the meantime, have the kindness to desist from farther injuring me.—I am, sir,' &c.

'Well, Manson,' said I, after having read the letter, 'what do you think of it?'

'Why, that its writer is a mean-spirited, sneaking, canting fellow, and a most accomplished hypocrite,' replied Manson.

'Then, upon my word,' said I, 'I cannot agree with you; neither can I help beginning to entertain a somewhat different opinion of this man. I now doubt the truth of much that has been said against him. I do not know how it is, but this unalterable gentleness of his has a strange effect on me; it is beginning to make me feel somewhat ashamed of myself, as regards the part I have acted towards him. In truth, this mildness of spirit, with all its seeming inertness, appears to me to possess an extraordinary power. Had he given us bad language that day we called with the subscription-paper, my prejudices would have been confirmed ; but his suavity has completely disarmed me. What do you mean to do, Manson, with regard to that letter ?'

' Why, to take no notice of it. I do not mean to answer it : I wish to have no correspondence with such a character.'

About a week after this, we had a subscription-ball in H—, got up by some of our gayer and wealthier towns-men. Amongst those present were Johnson and his sister, a lady-like girl of about two-and-twenty, to whom, it was said, her brother was extremely kind and attentive. On this occasion, Johnson and his sister were treated with marked courtesy on all hands. Some, as if studiously to insult them, turned their backs on them when they approached ; others got out of their way with offensive haste ; while others, again, sneered at them while they passed. I could observe that Miss Johnson felt keenly the treatment to which her brother and herself were subjected. She looked pale and agitated ; and, occasionally, as a more than usually marked instance of disrespect occurred, a blush would hurry over her fine, intelligent countenance. Johnson, again, though apparently not less sensible of the contumely to which he and his sister were exposed, met it differently : his demeanour, as he perambulated the ball-room, with his sister leaning on his arm, was calm and collected, while a gentle and significant, but almost imperceptible smile played about his rather handsome mouth. I really could not help admiring his calmness and self-possession under these trying circumstances.

Greatly struck by what had fallen under my observation, I could not help reflecting, as I went home, that surely he must be no common man who could thus maintain his temper under such trying circumstances ; and I began to feel a friendship for him taking possession of me. Being now anxious to be convinced of his worth, I determined on stepping into his shop now and then, and having some conversation with him. Let me here parenthetically remark, that, in spite of the rumours that had been circulated against him, and in spite of the efforts of a clique to injure his business, or, rather, to prevent him obtaining any, Johnson was gradually acquiring a fair share of custom. His mildness and civility, together with the perfect propriety of his conduct, were gradually overcoming prejudice and winning confidence. People said: 'As to the unfavourable reports of Mr Johnson's character, we must suspend judgment: we believed them at first, certainly, but now we have our doubts. Besides, his articles are, at least, as reasonable in price, and certainly much better in quality, than those of many dealers in town.'

In pursuance of the resolution I had formed, I called, a day or two after the ball, on Mr Johnson, and sat for nearly two hours with him—fascinated at once by his singularly pleasant and gentle manners, by his great intelligence, and by the extraordinary extent and variety of his information. There was, even in the tones of his voice, a charm that I found exercising a powerful influence over me.

I frequently repeated my calls, and after each interview, became more and more satisfied that Johnson had been grievously wronged. Under this impression, I took every opportunity of expressing amongst my friends and acquaintances my strong doubts of the truth of the reports. To my great gratification, I found almost everybody, although they had no such opportunities of correcting their opinions, willing to believe that he had been unjustly dealt by.

By and by, Mr Johnson and I became so intimate, and I so assured of his innocence as regarded the special accusations which scandal had circulated against him, that I ventured one day to mention them to him. He said calmly: 'My dear sir, I knew from the very first of the circulation of these rumours; but, excepting one letter to Mr Manson, I have never made any attempt to meet them with a denial, being certain that my own conduct would be their only effectual refutation. Since you have adverted to the subject as a friend, I will explain all to you. As is often the case, these reports are not altogether creatures of any one's imagination, but have a certain basis in fact, though not as applicable to me.' He then proceeded to shew—proving at the same time the truth of what he said by various documents—that the forgery of which he had been accused, instead of being committed by him, had been committed upon him ; and this by a nephew of his own, whom he had forborne to prosecute, although his loss by the act had exceeded L.2000. As to the desertion of wife and children, he also satisfied me, first, that he had never been married at all, nor ever had had any children ; next, that the family alluded to was the widow and children of his brother, whom he was now supporting, and had supported for many years. He shewed me a number of letters from the widow, who resided in a distant part of England, and several from her elder children, whom he was educating ; all of which were filled with expressions of the warmest love and gratitude.

A letter which he next produced, and which he had but a day or two before received from the rector of Combermeath, his native parish, was written in an affectionate strain, and bore, in an incidental way, the strongest testimony to his moral and religious character.

'Now,' said he, laughing, 'we come to the last remaining charge—my fraudulent bankruptcy. Well, it is true, perfectly true, that I did stop payment about fifteen years since ; chiefly in consequence of the forgery on me by my nephew, and partly in consequence of large losses otherwise. But success in business enabled me at a subsequent period to pay all my creditors in full, including interest. Of the satisfaction of my creditors with my conduct on the occasion of which I speak, I have evidence, inscribed, not indeed on a tablet of brass, but on a vessel or rather utensil of silver, which I will shew you.'

Having said this, he rose, went to a corner of the shop, and drew a bell-pull. His sister—there being an internal communication between the shop and the house which was above—answered the summons.

'Izzy, dear,' said Johnson, 'will you be so kind as bring down the salver which was presented to me by my good friends at Combermeath?'

Miss Johnson quickly appeared with a large, massive, and richly ornamented piece of plate, which her brother desired her to put into my hands; directing my attention at the same time to an inscription in the centre. This inscription I read, and found it to be a flattering testimonial, from Mr Johnson's creditors, to the excellence of his character, and expressing their deep sense of his rare integrity, as exemplified in the circumstance of his having paid in full, and with interest, the several sums he owed them, after he had been legally discharged of the same.

Dear reader, the man of whom I have been speaking—the man who was so slandered and traduced when he first came amongst us—who was called everything that was bad—who was shunned and despised—is now first magistrate of H—, and has long been esteemed, as he indeed is, one of the worthiest men in the county.

GENERAL INVITATIONS.

'PRAY do call in an easy way some evening, you and Mrs Balderstone: we are suré to be at home, and shall be most happy to see you.' Such an invitation one is apt to get from friends, who, equally resolved against the formality and the expense of a particular entertainment on your account, hope to avoid both evils by making your visit a matter of accident. If you be a man of some experience, you will know that all such attempts to make bread and cheese do that which is more properly the business of a pair of chickens, end in disappointment; and you will, therefore, take care to wait till the general invitation becomes a particular one. But there are inexperienced people in the world who think everything is as it seems, and are apt to be greatly deceived regarding this accidental mode of visiting. For the sake of these last, I shall relate the following adventure:—

I had been remarkably busy one summer, and, consequently, obliged to refuse all kinds of invitations, general and particular. The kind wishes of my friends had accumulated upon me somewhat after the manner of the tunes frozen up in Baron Munchausen's French-horn ; and it seemed as if a whole month would have been necessary to thaw out and discharge the whole of these obligations. A beginning, however, is always something ; and, accordingly, one rather splashy evening in November, I can't tell how it was, but a desire came simultaneously over myself and Mrs Balderstone—it seemed to be by sympathy —of stepping out to see Mr and Mrs Brown, a married pair, who had been considerably more pressing in their general invitations than any other of our friends. We both knew that there was a cold duck in the house, besides a segment of cheese, understood to be more than excellent. But so it was that we had taken a visiting humour, and forth we must go. Five minutes saw us leaving our comfortable home, my wife carrying a cap pinned under her cloak, while to my pocket was consigned her umbraeuous comb. As we paced along, we speculated only on the pleasure which we should give to our kind friends by thus at last paying them a visit, when perhaps all hope of our ever doing so was dead within them. Nor was it possible altogether to omit reflecting, like the dog invited by his friend to sup, upon the entertainment which lay before us ; for certainly, on such an occasion, the fatted calf could hardly expect to be spared.

Full of the satisfaction which we were to give and receive, we had nearly entered the house before we thought it necessary to inquire if anybody was at home. The servant-girl, surprised by the confidence of our entrée, evidently forgot her duty, and acknowledged, when she should have denied, the presence of her master and mistress in the house. We were shewn into a dining-room, clean, cold, and stately as an alabaster cave, and which had the appearance of being but rarely lighted by the blaze of hospitality. My first impulse was to relieve my pocket, before sitting down, of the comb, which I thought was now about being put to its proper use; but the chill of the room stayed my hand. I observed, at the same time, that my wife, like the man under the influence of Æolus in the fable, manifested no symptom of parting with her cloak. Ere we could communicate our mutual sensations of incipient disappointment, Mrs Brown entered with a flurried, surprised air, and made a prodigious effort to give us welcome. But, alas! poor Mr Brown—he had been seized in the afternoon with a strange vertigo and sickness, and was now endeavouring, by the advice of Dr Boak, to get some repose. ‘It will be such a disappointment to him, when he learns that you were here, for he would have been so happy to see you. We must just entertain the hope, however, to see you some other night.’ Although the primary idea in our minds at this moment was the utter hopelessness of supper in this quarter—we betrayed, of course, no feeling but sympathy in the illness of our unfortunate friend, and a regret for having called at so inauspicious a moment. Had any unconcerned person witnessed our protestations, he could have formed no suspicion that we ever contemplated supper, or were now in the least disappointed. We felt anxious about nothing but to relieve Mrs Brown, as soon as possible, of the inconvenience of our visit, more especially as the chill of the room was now piercing us to the bone. We therefore retired, under a shower of mutual compliments, and condolences, and ‘hopes,’ and ‘sorries,’ and ‘have the pleasures;’ the door at last closing after us with a noise which seemed to say: ‘How very glad I am to get quit of you!’

When we got to the street, we certainly did not feel quite so mortified as the dog already alluded to, seeing that we had not, like him, been tossed over the window. But still the reverse of prospect was so very bitter, that for some time we could hardly believe that the adventure was real. By this time, we had expected to be seated snug at supper, side by side with two friends, who, we anticipated, would almost expire with pleasure at seeing us. But here, on the contrary, we were turned out upon the cold, inhospitable street, without a friend's face to cheer us. We still recollect that the cold duck remained as a fortress to fall back upon ; but being now fairly agog in the adventure, the idea of returning home with our object unaccomplished, was not to be thought of. Supper we must have in some other house than our own, let it cost what it may. 'Well,' said Mrs Balderstone, 'there are the Jacksons ! They live not far from this—suppose we drop in upon them ? I'm sure we have had enough of invitations to their house. The very last time I met Mrs Jackson on the street, she told me she was never going to ask us again—we had refused so long—she was going, she said, just to let us come if we liked, and when we liked.' Off we went, therefore, to try the Jacksons.

On applying at the door of this house, it flew open, as it were by enchantment, and the servant-girl, so far from hesitating, like the other, seemed to expect no question to be asked on entrée. We moved into the lobby, and inquired if Mr and Mrs Jackson were at home, which was answered by the girl with a surprised affirmative. We now perceived, from the pile of hats and cloaks in the lobby, as well as a humming noise from one of the rooms, that the Jacksons had a large company, and that we were understood by the servant to be part of it. The Jacksons, thought we (I know my wife thought so, although I never asked), give some people particular invitations. Our object was now to make an honourable retreat ; for, although my dress was not entirely a walking one, and my wife's cap was brought with the prospect of making an appearance of dress, we were by no means fit to match with those who had dressed on purpose for the party, even although we should be asked to join them. Just at this moment, Mrs Jackson happened to cross the lobby, on hospitable thoughts intent, and, to her own misfortune, caught a glimpse of us. 'Oh, Mrs Balderstone, how do you do ? How are you, Mr Balderstone ? I'm so delighted that you have come. We have just a few friends with us, and it will be so delightful if you will join them,

Come into this room, and take off your bonnet; and you, Mr Balderstone, just you be so good as step up to the drawing-room; you'll find numbers there that you know. And Mr Jackson will be so happy to see you,' &c. All this, however, would not do. Mrs Balderstone and I not only felt a little hurt at the want of specialty in our invitations to this house, but could not endure the idea of mingling in a crowd better dressed and more regularly invited than ourselves. We therefore begged Mrs Jackson to excuse us for this night. We had just called in passing, and, indeed, we never attended ceremonious parties at any time. We would see her some other evening, when she was less engaged—that is to say, we should take care to trouble her no more. And so off we came, with complimentary language upon our tongues, but by no means conformable feelings in our hearts.

Again upon the street—once again. What was to be done now? ‘Why,’ said Mrs Balderstone, ‘there is excellent old Mrs Smiles, who lives in the next street. I have not seen her or the Misses Smiles for six months; but the last time they were so pressing for us to return their visit (you remember they drank tea with us in spring?) that I think we cannot do better than pop in upon them.’

Mrs Smiles, a respectable widow, lived with her five daughters in a third floor in — Street. Thither we proceeded, with a hope, undiminished by the two preceding disappointments, that here at length we should meet friends ready to receive us in the manner we had been led to expect. Our knock at Mrs Smiles’ hospitable portal produced a strange rushing noise within; and when the servant appeared, I observed, in the dim vista of the passage, one or two slip-slop figures darting across out of one door into another, and others, again, crossing in the opposite direction; and then there was heard a low, anxious whispering, while a single dishevelled head peeped out from one of the doors, and then the head was withdrawn, and all was still. We were introduced into a room which had evidently been the scene of some recent turmoil of no ordinary kind, for female clothes lay scattered in every direction, besides some articles which more properly belong to a dressing-room. We had not been here above a minute, when we heard our advent announced by the servant in an adjoining apartment to Mrs Smiles herself and some of her young ladies. A flood of obloquy was instantly opened upon the girl by one of her young mistresses—Miss Eliza, we thought—for having given admission to anybody at this late hour, especially when she knew that they were to be up early next morning to commence their journey, and had still a great many of their things to pack. ‘And such a room you have shewn them into, you goose!’ said the enraged Miss. The girl was questioned as to our appearance, for she had neglected to ask our name; and then we heard one young lady say: ‘It must be those Balderstones. What can have set them a-gadding to-night? I suppose we must ask them to stay to supper, for they’ll have come for nothing else. Mary, you are in best trim; will you go in and speak to them till we get ourselves ready? The cold meat will do, with a few eggs. I’m sure they could not have come at a worse time.’ Miss Mary, accordingly, came hastily in after a few minutes, and received us with a thousand protestations of welcome. Her mother would be so truly delighted to see us, for she had fairly given up all hope of our ever visiting her again. She was just getting ready, and would be here immediately. ‘In the meantime, Mrs Balderstone, you will lay by your cloak and bonnet. Let me assist you,’ &c. We had had enough, however, of the Smileses. We saw we had dropped into the midst of a scene of easy dishabille, and surprised it with unexpected ceremony. It would have been cruel to the Smileses to put them to trouble at such a time, and ten times more cruel to ourselves to sit in friendly intercourse with a family who had treated us in such a manner behind our backs. ‘These Balderstones!’ My wife, therefore, represented that we had only called upon our return from a walk, and without intending to stay. As Mrs Smiles was out of order, we would not disturb her that evening, but call on some other occasion. Of course, the more that we declaimed about the impossibility of remaining, the more earnestly did Miss Smiles entreat us to remain. It would be such a disappointment to her mother, and still more to Eliza and the rest of them. She was obliged, however, with well-affected reluctance, to give way to our impetuous desire of escaping.

Having once more stepped forth into the cold blast of November, we began to feel that supper was becoming a thing which we could not much longer, with comfort, trust to the contingency of general invitations. We therefore sent home our thoughts to the excellent cold duck and cheese which lay in our larder, and, picturing to ourselves the comfort of our parlour fireside, resolved no more to wander abroad in search of happiness, unless there should be something like a certainty of good fare and a hearty welcome elsewhere.

Thus it is always with general invitations. People give them without reflecting that they cannot be at all times ready to entertain visitors; cannot be so much as at home to have the chance of doing so. Others accept and act upon them, at the risk of either troubling their hosts very much, or receiving a very sorry entertainment. The sudden arrival of an unexpected guest, who has come on the faith of one of these delusive, roving invitations, often disorganises the economy of a whole household. Nothing tries a housewife so much. The state of her larder or cupboard instantaneously flashes on her mind; and if she do not happen to be an unusually wise virgin, fortified with scores of those invaluable articles which can be made ready at any time, she can scarcely fail to be reduced to the most awkward dilemma. Or you may chance to arrive at a death or a marriage, a period of mourning or rejoicing, when the sympathies of the family are all engaged with matters of their own, and when, of course, your visit will be productive of the greatest inconvenience.

If people will have their friends beside them, let them, for the sake of all that is comfortable, give a definite invitation at once : a general invitation is much worse than no invitation at all ; for it is as much as to say that the person is not worth inviting in a regular manner. On the other hand, I would advise all my friends to turn a deaf ear, if they be wise, to general invitations : they are nets spread out to ensnare their comfort. Rather let them be content with the maxim, which somebody has inscribed over a doorway in one of the ancient streets of Edinburgh, TECUM HABITA—Keep at Home. R. C.

VOYAGE OF AN ELEPHANT FROM INDIA.

IN one of my voyages, it was my good-fortune to have as a shipmate one of the great ones of the East—a personage of vast weight in his own country, and still more run after and admired on his arrival in this. Though he came on board with but one attendant, and with no luggage but a single trunk, he trod the deck with as firm a step and as lordly a mien as if he had been one of the magnates of the ship, as well as of the land. The captain himself was fain to keep at a respectful distance from his passenger. He was silent and reserved in his demeanour ; and the only person whom he honoured with exclusive friendship and attention, was a little whey-faced, under-sized, dirty fellow, who acted as butcher on board. Be not surprised at this singular preference, gentle reader ; the passenger with a single trunk was the same elephant which now exhibits its lordly form in the Regent Park Zoological Gardens ; and it was but natural that he should feel particularly attached to the man whose constant care it was to administer to his wants, and to study to gratify his peculiar tastes.

It was in July 1830, that preparations were made on board the Honourable Company's ship L——, for the reception of our unwieldy passenger. In all large East India ships there is a space between the booms, and before the bow of the long-boat, in which is a large open-barred pen, fitted up as a cow-house. In the present case, the roof of this was raised a few feet, the cow transferred to other quarters, and the place made as commodious as possible for its new tenant. Quantities of plantain stems, pumpkins, hay, joggry (a kind of coarse sugar), and other elephant luxuries, were sent on board, and an anxious look-out was kept for a favourable opportunity for the animal's embarkation—a matter of no trifling difficulty, as all those know who have crossed the Madras surf, and all those may know, who will read Captain Basil Hall's account of it. At length, the wished-for opportunity presented itself, and the elephant was marched down to the beach—the day was fine, and the surf uncommonly low. Many years had elapsed since an exhibition of the kind had taken place; and as great curiosity was excited on shore, a crowd assembled to witness the interesting spectacle. A large cargo-raft, or catamaran, was brought close to the water-mark on the beach, on each side of which a barricade of spars had been raised, with a vacant space between them in the centre. The elephant, with his keeper on his neck, was made to walk on to the raft, where he stood quietly between the barricades, while his fore and hind feet were secured with ropes to the spars below, and under his belly a stout piece of wood was passed, the ends of which rested on the barricades, so as partially to support the weight of his body. A well-manned massoolah boat lay outside the first line of surf, with a tow-line attached to the raft on shore. When all was ready, the catamaran was launched into the surf by a strong party of coolies, while the men in the massoolah boat plied their oars, and kept a tight strain upon the tow-line, and in a few moments the watery barrier was passed. It was a beautiful sight to see the noble animal standing apparently firm and unmoved when the surf dashed over the catamaran, and broke in white foam around him. It was an interesting proof of his confidence in man, that, though danger presented itself in such a novel and startling aspect, he braved it without flinching while he knew that his keeper was with him. The outer line of surf was easily passed, for on the day in question it was scarcely perceptible ; and the novel spectacle presented itself, of a man riding over the sea upon an elephant. Meantime, everything was in readiness on board the ship for his reception. A pair of immense slings had been prepared, such as are used for hoisting horses on board, only of larger dimensions, and much stronger materials ; he had been regularly measured for them some days before. I will attempt to describe them for the benefit of the uninitiated. They were made of strong canvas, bound, as the ladies would say, with small rope, formed into a long broad belt to pass under his belly, with a smaller one to pass behind like a breechin, and another similar one to go over his breast, to prevent his slipping out ; each end of the large belt or belly-band was strongly secured over a stout round bar of wood, to the extremities of which were fastened the ends of a short strong rope, with an iron thimble in the bight, or centre. The main-yard was topped up and well secured ; and as soon as the raft came alongside, the hands were called out, and every soul in the ship sent up to the tackle-fall. As soon as the slings were properly adjusted, the elephant's legs were released, and the keeper came on board. One of the men on the raft seeing the elephant raise one of his immense paws, thought he was in a dangerous neighbourhood, and jumped into the water, preferring the chance of being nibbled at by the sharks to the apparent certainty of being crushed by an elephant. When the man swam to the raft again, and was laughed at for his alarm, he said he thought 'a kick from such a foot as that would be no joke.' At length, all was ready—the tackle was hooked—'haul taut on deck,' was the cry—'tweet, tweet,' sounded the boatswain's call. 'Now, my lads, for a steady walk,' said the chief mate ; 'hoist away !' The fife struck up a merry tune, but was scarcely heard, for the men gave a cheer, and ran away with their unwonted burden ; and in a moment the giant animal was dangling thirty feet above the water's edge, as helpless as if he had been a sucking pig. His alarm and astonishment must have been great, to find himself in such an unusual predicament; but whatever his feelings might have been, the only expression he gave to them was a loud cry, between a grunt and a roar, when he was first carried off his legs by the tackle. He was quickly lowered on deck, where his keeper was standing in readiness to receive him, and to coax him into good-humour again, if necessary, with joggry and other delicacies. He seemed too much pleased, however, to find himself safe on his legs again, to think much of the novelty of his situation, or to appreciate properly the honour of being on the quarter-deck of one of the finest merchantmen in the world, but gazed on all around him with the most philosophic indifference. After allowing him a little time to recover his breath, he was coaxed forward, and hoisted over the booms into his new abode, the roof of which had been taken off to admit him. His keeper soon afterwards took leave of him with many salaams, and went on shore, and he was then consigned to the charge of the butcher.

Our passenger soon became reconciled to his new quarters, and was as much at home there as if he had been a sailor all his life. He remained on board the ship for nearly nine months, during which time we visited Penang, Singapore, China, and St Helena. His principal food was plantain stems, hay, pumpkins, and joggry, of the latter of which he was very fond; his daily allowance of water was eight gallons. He was remarkably mild and tractable, and fond of every one who treated him with kindness—would kneel down at the word of command in Hindostanee; and if asked to shake hands, lifted up his enormous paw to comply. His sagacity was astonishing, and would sometimes have done credit to a rational being: I must mention one or two instances of it. His cage had an opening at one end, about four feet square, to allow room for the butcher to enter with his food. One of his principal amusements was to put his head out of this opening, to see if we were all doing our duty properly, while his trunk was busily engaged in picking up all the ‘wee things’ that came within its reach. This he was enabled to do more comfortably by means of a stout plank, the end of which projected a couple of feet into the cage, and which he made use of as a step. One day, the carpenter requiring some of the plank for a particular purpose, cut a few feet off the end of it, and it was then too short to reach the cage. As soon as the elephant missed his footstool, he began to shew his displeasure by tearing down the thin planks with which his cage was lined, and uttering cries of anger. At last, he caught sight of a pack of staves lying on the booms near him, twisted his trunk round it, and dragged it into his cage ; then laying it down where the plank had been before, he mounted upon it, and gave a grunt of pleasure. On another occasion, the ship was staggering along before a strong breeze, and was rather suddenly hauled to the wind, which of course made her lie over very much. The moment the elephant felt the ship heeling over, he whirled round with his head to windward, and instantly thrusting his trunk through between the bars of his cage, twisted it round one of the spars lashed outside, and held on by it. When we arrived at Blackwall, in April 1831, crowds of visitors came on board to see the new importation, and they were all much pleased with his gentleness and docility. He took everything that was offered him in the eating way, and was not at all particular in his tastes ; indeed, on one occasion, a lady who put her reticule within tempting distance of his trunk, was rather astonished to see it transferred with surprising celerity from her hand to his mouth, and he swallowed it with as much relish, apparently, as if it had been a cabbage-leaf.

At last he was purchased for the Regent Park Zoological Gardens, and, I believe, proved a good speculation to the captain. A strong platform was erected on an inclined plane from the ship’s gangway down to the dock-walk, for the elephant’s accommodation in disembarking—but in vain : he put one foot upon it, fancied it was not firm, and drew back ; and nothing could have persuaded him to make a second attempt. We were obliged to hoist him out at last. As soon as he stood once more on the land, long lines were fastened to his feet, to check him in case he should attempt to run away, and he then quietly followed his keeper. As soon as he passed the dock-gate, where a crowd was assembled to welcome his appearance, he caught sight of the green hedges and trees down a lane to the right, and set off at a swinging trot to have a nearer look at them, trailing after him a whole rabble of boys, who were shouting and tugging at his heel-ropes. He was soon obliged to stop, and then housed in a neighbouring stable till the middle of the night; and when all was still, he was quietly marched up to his new quarters in Regent Park. Some weeks afterwards, a friend accompanied me to the Zoological Gardens to visit our old shipmate, and see whether he would recognise us. As he was still a novelty, a number of people were assembled round his house, feeding him with cakes, and other acceptables of the kind. When we spoke to him, he seemed to recognise us, but whether he did so or not, he understood us, for, to the great surprise of the persons around, when we said in Hindostanee, ‘Kneel down,’ he did so immediately, and likewise raised his foot to shake hands, when told. I have not seen him since that time, but I have heard that he is doing well, and has greatly increased in size since he left his native shores.

THE TWO MOTHERS:

A STORY FROM THE CAUSES CÉLÈBRES.

ON the 14th of November 1722, Marguerite Brunot, wife of a shoemaker of Paris, gave birth to a son, who was baptised in the parish church of St Louis on the following day. Along with this child was baptised another, also a boy, born on the same day, and the offspring of Anne Troelle, wife of René Troelle, a master carver in Paris. The one child was named Michel Brunot, and the other Bernard François Troelle.

The families of Brunot and Troelle were near neighbours, and lived on the most intimate terms; hence they were led to propose putting the children to nurse in the same place, and the place chosen was the village of Richeville, in Normandy—a district considered as peculiarly healthy and proper for such a purpose by the Parisian mothers. It was arranged that the same woman should take both children to their country abode. Accordingly, when this person came to the house of the Brunots, the infant of the Troelles was sent for, and brought to the conductress. The wife of Brunot took the precaution, though probably dreaming little of the issue, to mark the wrapper which was upon her child, by sewing to it a little piece of dressed leather from her husband's stores. It does not appear that the sculptor's wife thought of any precaution of the kind. Attired alike in all respects but the one mentioned, as infants commonly are, the two children were taken away by their conductress to Richeville.

Separate nurses had there been provided for the children. It was subsequently asserted by certain of the parties concerned, that at the time the children were handed over to their respective nurses, a mistake took place, and that the infants were confounded one with the other. It was said that the child of the Troelles was given to one nurse as that of the Brunots, the Troelle nurse, of course, getting the child of the other family. However this matter stood, it is certain that the child given out to nurse as that of the Troelles, lived only seventeen days, and was buried in the parish cemetery of Richeville. The mortuary extract upon the subject bore, that 'On the 2d of December 1722, died, and on the 3d was buried, Bernard François Troelle, son of M. Troelle, carver in Paris, which child was at nurse with Claude Lecerle, our parishioner.'

To the wife of Troelle was sent all the clothing of the deceased infant, and here it was that the first idea of something wrong suggested itself. Among the linen sent to her, Madame Troelle found an old cap, marked with a G. This discovery startled her. The thought sprang up that her child was not dead; and she went directly to the house of the shoemaker Brunot, and told his wife that she did not believe her infant to be dead, shewing, at the same time, the strange cap which she had found. Brunot's wife declared that the cap was none of hers, and said that if Madame Troelle had any doubts upon the subject, the best way would be to go to the spot, and there endeavour to ascertain the truth. The carver's wife, however, appears to have had her hopes shaken by the cap being not that of her neighbour, and the matter fell aside for the time.

Four or five months afterwards, the Brunots changed the nurse of their boy, sending him to Boisemond, a place about a league from Richeville, where a curate, cousin to Brunot, had his residence. Under the eyes of this relative, the child remained for two years, after which it was taken home to the house of the Brunots in Paris. Some time after this event, Madame Troelle, who had brooded incessantly over the supposition, that not her child, but that of the shoemaker, had died, was roused by the sight of the returned infant to claim it openly. She went to the house of the Brunots, and in a state of great excitement, demanded the restoration of the boy. Her cries of 'Give me my child—give me my child!' attracted a crowd. Troelle's wife had already impressed some of the neighbours with a belief in the justice of her claim, and Brunot and his wife were greatly abused and insulted by the crowd. In consequence of this outrage, the Brunots appealed to the law, and the Troelles were ordered to keep the peace under heavy penalties, and to pay all expenses of appeal.

On the other hand, Troelle and his wife brought an action against the Brunots, to procure the restoration of the child, alleging it to be theirs. They actually got a decree in the first instance, ordering the delivery of the child to them by the shoemaker and his wife. But the latter brought an appeal against this decision, and then the case was formally tried in court, the best advocates of the day being employed on both sides. The Troelles founded their claim on the following circumstances:—The child to which Madame Brunot gave birth was feeble and delicate, and even had a serious illness before being sent out to nurse; now, the child of the Troelles was remarkably strong and healthy, and was less likely to be the first to take a fatal illness. The child in dispute, also, was very healthy. Again, the Troelles averred that the two children, when first sent to nurse at Richeville, were laid in one bed by their conductress, and then were mistaken one for the other, and were given to the wrong nurses accordingly. Of this assertion, the only proof brought by them was, that a cap marked G, not belonging to Madame Troelle's child, but to Brunot's, was sent to her on the infant's asserted decease. The letter G was the first letter of M. Brunot's name—Guillaume. (Madame Troelle also averred, that the linen, marked by the Brunots with a piece of leather, came to her at the same time; but as she at first mentioned nothing but the cap, this second statement was not believed, and indeed greatly damaged her cause.) Again, the Troelles asserted, that the linens which the living child wore, on being taken from Richeville to Boisemont, were precisely those originally given by Madame Troelle to her child. And, lastly, it was stated that the living child bore a strong resemblance to the other children of the Troelles, and none to Brunot's family.

Slight as these grounds appear to be, they formed the whole case of the Troelles, and were the foundation of a trial that greatly interested the public of France. The Brunots answered them chiefly by denying that the cap marked G ever belonged to them or their child; and by pointing to the register which contained the record of the infant Troelle's death. They shewed that no proof existed of any exchange of the children ever having taken place. As for the change of health in the child, such things were too common to excite the slightest surprise. With regard to the resemblance of the disputed child to the Troelles, the wife of Brunot did not deny that there was a seeming likeness between them ; and for this she could only account by the circumstance of her having been much struck, before the birth of the child, by seeing the corpse of another infant of the Troelles, and gazing on it long. The Brunots also dwelt on the fact of no claim having been made for two whole years.

The court, after hearing long pleadings on both sides, came to the conclusion, that the children had never been exchanged—that the dead child was that of the Troelles ; and, accordingly, the decree of the judges was, that the shoemaker Brunot and his wife should keep the infant.

To this case, the compiler of the Causes Célèbres adds an anecdote, which seems to have suggested the plot of Miss Edgeworth's excellent story entitled Ennui. A nurse, into whose charge was given the child of a rich noble, had an ambition to see her own son a lord. She accordingly exchanged the one infant for the other, and, in time, the changeling became inheritor of the wealth of his supposed ancestors. The real heir, having the claims of a foster-brother upon his substitute, went to him, and was taken into his service. Distinguishing himself highly by his probity and good conduct, the servant became his master's intimate friend, and was treated by him more as a real than as a foster-brother. In the course of time, the nurse was taken ill. She then sent for her real son, the seeming gentleman of birth, and disclosed the whole secret to him. Going home immediately afterwards, he there took an opportunity of telling the story, as if it had occurred to third parties, and concluded by asking his servant and foster-brother what he would have done had he been the true heir, and had learned the secret from the supposed one. ‘I would have halved my fortune with the other,’ was the immediate answer. ‘Then your sincerity must now be tested. You and I are the true parties to whom I alluded.’ The real heir did not shrink from his word, but shared his means fairly with his former master.

THE SHEPHERD'S DOG:

A TRUE STORY.

'TWAS in the flowery month of June,
When hill and valley glow
With purple heath and golden whin,
White thorn and crimson rose;

When balmy dews fall soft and sweet,
And linger half the day,
Until the sun, with all his heat,
Can scarce clear them away;

Amid the Grampian mountains dun,
A shepherd tended sheep,
And took with him his infant son,
Up to a craggy steep.

The sheep lay scattered far and wide;
The sky was high and clear;
The shepherd's dog pressed close beside
The child so fair and dear.

The father and his darling boy
Lay dreaming on the hill,
Above them, all was light and joy;
Around them, all was still.

When, hark ! a low and distant bleat
Broke on the shepherd's ear,
He quickly started to his feet—
Dark mists were gathering near.

The shepherd knew the storm might last Through all the day and night,
And feared his sheep, amid the blast,
Might stray far in their fright.

He kissed, and charged his boy to stay
Behind the craggy steep;
And with his dog he went away
To gather in his sheep.

An hour had scarcely passed, when back
To the same spot he came,
Called on his boy; while rock to rock
But echoed back his name.

No trace, no track, no sound was there!
He searched, he called in vain;
Then home he rushed in wild despair,
Immediate help to gain.

He gathered friends and neighbours round—
They scaled the craggy height;
But he they sought could not be found,
Although they searched all night.

Three days and nights they still sought on;
Their efforts all were vain:
The shepherd's son was surely gone,
Never to come again.

Meantime, the shepherd's dog was seen,
When given its morning cake,
With the whole cake his teeth between,
The hillside road to take.

The shepherd, wondering what this meant—
His son still in his mind—
After the dog one morning went,
Which flew as fleet as wind.

Up, up, a high o'erhanging crag,
The dog in haste hath gone,
Then gave his tail a joyous wag;
The shepherd followed on.

A rocky ledge at length he gained,
 His heart beat thick with joy,
 For lo ! the cave above contained,
 All safe, his darling boy !

The bread the hungry infant took,
 The dog lay at his feet ;
 The cake in two the child then broke,
 And then they both did eat.

Such feasts of love are seldom seen
 In gay and festal halls,
 As this poor shepherd saw within
 That cavern's rocky walls.

WONDERFUL cures were abundant in the days of antiquity. It is probable that Æsculapius himself, if any such person ever existed, was chiefly, if not solely, one who performed cures by working on the imagination of his patients. The numerous and noted body of priests who ministered in his temples in ancient Greece and Italy, were unquestionably healers of this order. Amulets, consisting of precious stones or certain plants, worn on the body; charms in the form of words, prayers, and music; and the practice of magical rites—were all of them familiar modes of cure among the ancients, and continued to be so among many of the most advanced modern nations till a recent period. Indeed, the separation of genuine medicine from superstitious practices, is, even in England, a comparatively modern event; that is to say, amongst the learned, for the more ignorant people of all ranks yet put trust in quack medicines. There seems a good reason for this. Medicine is exactly one of those sciences in which the relation of cause and effect is of the sufficient degree of obscurity to call for the exercise of our sense of wonder. To the great mass of mankind, the change produced in a diseased body by the natural operation of a chemical substance, vegetable or mineral, must appear nearly as wonderful as the supposition that three unintelligible words pronounced over it will effect a cure. They do not trace the steps of the process in the one case more than the other; and it is an inability to trace these steps, as Dr Adam Smith, in his History of Astronomy, has clearly shewn, which produces the sentiment of wonder. Accordingly, pretensions to miraculous curing have been at all times a ready means of imposing upon mankind.

Till the early part of the eighteenth century, it was the custom of at least the sovereign of Great Britain, if not for several other European monarchs, to go periodically through the ceremony of touching, for the king's evil or scrofula. It was supposed that a real sovereign—that is, one possessing a full hereditary title, or, in other words, reigning by divine right—was able to cure a person afflicted with that disease, by a mere touch of his hand. In England, the ceremony had been in vogue for many centuries. It was generally supposed to have been first practised by Edward the Confessor; and there is good evidence that it was in use in the thirteenth century. In the fifteenth, during the reign of Edward IV., we find the learned legal writer, Sir John Fortescue, speaking of the gift of healing as a privilege which had from time immemorial belonged to the kings of England. He attributes the virtue to the unction imparted to their hands at the coronation. Even the powerful mind of Elizabeth was not superior to this superstition, and she frequently came before her people in the character of a miraculous healer. There was a regular office in the English Book of Common Prayer, for the performance of the ceremony. The persons desirous of being cured appear to have been introduced by a bishop, or other high dignitary of the church. Prayers were said, and every effort made to produce in the patients a firm reliance on the power of the Deity, as about to be manifested through the royal hand. At the moment of imposing the hand, the king said: ‘I touch, but God healeth ;’ and afterwards hung a coin round the patient’s neck, which he was to wear for the remainder of his life. The Stuarts, from their extreme notions of divine right, and the weak and superstitious character of the most of them, were great sticklers for this part of their royal prerogative, and frequently put it to use. Dr Johnson had an indistinct recollection of being touched when a child by Queen Anne. The old Jacobites, however, used to say, that the virtue did not descend to Mary, William, and Anne, seeing that they wanted the divine right. Still less would they believe that it resided in the sovereigns of the Brunswick dynasty, who, however, never put it to the proof. Since the death of Anne, there have been, we believe, no touchings for the evil ; and the office for the ceremony has been silently allowed to drop out of the Prayer-book.

The Jacobites, while believing the Georges to be incapable of healing, were not disinclined to the notion that the Pretender possessed the gift. The laborious Carte brought disgrace upon his History of England by introducing, in a note, an account of one Christopher Lovel, a labouring man of Bristol, who, being grievously afflicted with king’s evil, which appeared in five great sores on his neck, breast, and arms, proceeded in August 1716 to Avignon, and was there touched by the exiled prince. ‘The usual effect,’ he says, ‘followed. From the moment that the man was touched, and invested with the narrow ribbon, to which a small piece of silver was pendent, according to the rites prescribed in the office appointed by the church for that solemnity, the humour dispersed insensibly, his sores healed up, and he recovered strength daily, till he arrived in perfect health, in the beginning of January following, at Bristol.’ Carte tells us, that he himself saw the man soon after, and found him in a vigorous frame of body, with no appearance of the disease but the red scars which it had left ; and he evidently must have been of opinion, that the cure was the effect of a miraculous virtue in the Pretender’s hand.

A writer of the day, in commenting upon this passage in Mr Carte's book, takes a sensible view of the case. He attributes the cure to the exercise of the journey, the change of air and of food, and to the medical treatment to which, he says, the man was subjected immediately after the touch. And the cure, he says, was, after all, only temporary. After a short time, the sores broke out afresh, and the man perished in a new attempt to reach the court of Avignon.

Carte affected to be puzzled to account for the cure of Lovel, seeing that the royal personage who performed the cure was not an anointed king; for the virtue, it was supposed, lay in the unction, as expressed by Sir John Fortescue. It must have been a virtue, we fear, liable to accommodate itself to circumstances, out of deference to the exigencies of royalty. When Prince Charles Stuart was at Holyrood House, in October 1745, he, although only claiming to be Prince of Wales and regent, touched a female child for the king's evil, who in twenty-one days became perfectly cured ! *

The seventeenth, and early part of the eighteenth centuries, present us with several examples of private persons who were supposed to have a miraculous power of curing by touch. The most celebrated was a Mr Valentine Greatrakes, a Protestant gentleman of the county of Waterford, born in 1628—a thoroughly sound Christian and good man, and occupying a highly respectable place in society. It was some time after the Restoration, while acting as clerk of the peace to the county of Cork, that Mr Greatrakes first arrived at a conviction of his possession of healing powers. In an account of himself, which he wrote in 1666, he says : ' About four years since, I had an impulse which frequently suggested to me that there was bestowed on me the gift of curing the king's evil, which, for the extraordinariness thereof, I thought fit to conceal for some time. But at length I told my wife ; for, whether sleeping or waking, I had this impulse. But her reply was, that it was an idle imagination. But to prove the contrary, one William Maher, of the parish of Lismore, brought his son to my wife, who used to distribute medicines in charity to the neighbours; and my wife came and told me, that I had now an opportunity of trying my impulse, for there was one at hand that had the evil grievously in the eyes, throat, and cheeks; whereupon I laid my hands on the places affected, and prayed to God, for Jesus' sake, to heal him. In a few days afterwards, the father brought his son with the eye so changed, that it was almost quite whole; and, to be brief (to God's glory I speak it), within a month he was perfectly healed, and so continues.'

Another person, still more afflicted, was soon after cured by Mr Greatrakes in the same manner; and he then began to receive 'an impulse,' suggesting that he could cure other diseases. This he soon had an opportunity of proving, for 'there came unto me a poor man, with a violent pain in his loins, that he went almost double, and having also a grievous ulcer in his leg, very black, who desired me, for God's sake, to lay my hands on him; whereupon I put my hands on his loins and flank, and immediately went the pains out of him, so that he was relieved, and could stand upright without trouble; the ulcer also in his leg was healed; so that, in a few days, he returned to his labour as a mason.'

He now became extensively known for his gift of healing, and was resorted to by people from greater distances, with the most of whom he was equally successful. Wounds, ulcers, convulsions, and dropsy, were among the maladies which he cured. In an epidemic fever, he was also eminently successful, healing all who came to him. So great was the resort to his house, that all the outhouses connected with it were usually filled with patients; and he became so much engaged in the duty of healing them, as to have no time to attend to his own affairs, or to enjoy the society of his family. The clergy of the diocese at length took alarm at his proceedings, and

- he was cited by the Dean of Lismore before the Bishop's Court, by which he was forbidden to exercise his gift for the future—an order which reminds us of the decree of Louis XIV., commanding that no more miracles should be performed at the tomb of the Abbé Paris. Mr Greatrakes, nevertheless, continued to heal as formerly, until his fame reached England. In August 1665, he received a visit from Mr Flamstead, the astronomer, who was afflicted with a constitutional weakness; but he failed in this case. Early in the ensuing year, he went to England for the purpose of curing the Viscountess Conway of an inveterate headache, in which also he failed. But, while residing at Ragley with the Conway family, he cured many hundreds afflicted with various diseases. Lord Conway himself, in a letter to his brother, thus speaks of the healer:—‘I must confess, that, before his arrival, I did not believe the tenth part of those things which I have been an eye-witness of; and several others, of as accurate judgment as any in the kingdom, who are come hither out of curiosity, do acknowledge the truth of his operations. This morning, the Bishop of Gloucester recommended to me a prebend’s son in his diocese, to be brought to him for a leprosy from head to foot, which hath been judged incurable above ten years, and in my chamber he cured him perfectly; that is, from a moist humour, ’twas immediately dried up, and began to fall off—the itching was quite gone, and the heat of it taken away. The youth was transported to admiration. . . . After all, I am far from thinking that his cures are at all miraculous. I believe it is by a sanative virtue and a natural efficiency, which extends not to all diseases, but is much more proper and effectual to some than to others, as he doth also despatch some with a great deal of ease, and others not without a great deal of pains.’

He was now invited by the king to come to London, whether he accordingly proceeded; and as he went along through the country, we are told that the magistrates of cities and towns begged of him that he would come and cure their sick. The king, though not fully persuaded of his wonderful gift, recommended him to the notice of his physicians, and permitted him to do all the good he pleased in London. He went every day to a particular part of the city, where a prodigious number of people, of all ranks and of both sexes, assembled. The only visible means he took to cure them, was to stroke the parts affected. The gout, rheumatism, and other painful affections, were driven by his touch from one part to another, till he got them expelled at the very extremities of the body, after which the patient was considered as cured. Such phenomena could not fail, in the most superstitious era of our history, to excite great wonder, and attract universal attention. The Cavalier wits and courtiers ridiculed them, as they ridiculed everything else that appeared serious. St Evremond, then at court, wrote a sarcastic novel on the subject, under the title of The Irish Prophet. Others, including several of the faculty, defended him. It even appears that the Royal Society, unable to refute the facts, were compelled to account for them as produced by ‘a sanative contagion in Mr Greatrake’s body, which had an antipathy to some particular diseases, and not to others.’ They also published some of his cures in their Transactions. A severe pamphlet by Dr Lloyd, chaplain of the Charterhouse, caused Mr Greatrakes at this time to publish the account of himself which has been already quoted. In it he says: ‘Many demand of me why some are cured, and not all. To which question I answer, that God may please to make use of such means by me, as shall operate according to the dispositions of the patient, and therefore cannot be expected to be alike efficacious in all. They also demand of me, why some are cured at once and not all! and why the pains should fly immediately out of some, and take such ambages in others! and why it should go out of some at their eyes, and some at their fingers, some at their ears or mouths? To which I say, if all these things could have a plain account given of them, there would be no cause to count them strange. Let them tell me what substance that is which removes and goes out with such expedition, and it will be more easy to resolve their questions. Some will know of me, why or how I do pursue some pains from place to place, till I have chased them out of the body, by laying my hands on the outside of the clothes only (as is usual), and not all pains? To which I answer, that—and others have been abundantly satisfied that it is so—though I am not able to give a reason, yet I am apt to believe there are some pains which afflict men after the manner of evil spirits, which kind of pains cannot endure my hand, nay, not my gloves, but fly immediately, though six or eight coats or cloaks be put between the person and my hand; as at the Lady Ranelagh's at York House, in London, as well as in Ireland, has been manifested. Now, another question will arise, whether the operation of my hand proceeds from the temperature of my body, or from a divine gift, or from both? To which I say, that I have reason to believe that there is some extraordinary gift of God.' At the end of his narrative are appended a number of certificates as to his cures, signed by the most respectable, pious, and learned persons of the day, amongst whom are the Honourable Robert Boyle, Bishop Rust, Dr Cudworth, Dr Patrick, Dr Whichcot, and Dr Wilkins. In 1667, he returned to Ireland, where he lived for many years, but without sustaining his reputation for curing. It appears, however, that, upon the strictest inquiry, no blemish could ever be found to attach to the character of this extraordinary man. All he did, was done in a spirit of pure piety and benevolence. The truth of the impressive words with which he concludes his own narrative was never challenged: 'Whether I have done my duty as a Christian, in employing that talent which God had intrusted me withal, to the good of people distressed and afflicted, or no, judge you and every good man. Thus far I appeal to the world, whether I have taken rewards, deluded or deceived any man. All further I will say is, that I pray I may never be weary of welldoing, and that I may be found a faithful servant when I come to give up my last account.'

William Read, who lived in the reign of Queen Anne, and had been originally a poor illiterate tailor, acquired a great reputation for a gift of curing blindness and defects in the eyesight. In time, he acquired a fortune, and Queen Anne, who gave him the care of her eyes, thought proper to knight him. A wretched woman named Mapp, of coarse masculine habits, became famous about the year 1736 for a wonderful gift of setting bones ; and in 1748, the whole of England rang with the fame of Bridget Bostock of Coppenhall, in Cheshire, a poor, infirm, old creature, who cured multitudes afflicted with all sorts of diseases — at first, by merely having the names of patients sent to her, that she might pray for them, but afterwards by rubbing the parts affected by her fasting spittle, and blessing and praying for them on the spot. The latest examples of wonderful cures are those performed by Prince Hohenloe in 1824, by prayers said at a distance of several hundred miles from the afflicted person.

These supposed miraculous cures certainly form a curious chapter in the history of the human mind. How strange to reflect, that the belief in the power of the royal touch existed, without so much as being questioned, for the better part of a thousand years, and only came into discredit within the recollection almost of people still living ! That such impostors as Read, Mapp, and Bostock, should have so recently been able to practise a thriving trade of pretended miraculous healing, also shews how far the public mind, in even the most enlightened countries, is from being in a thoroughly enlightened state. The usual mode of accounting for such pseudo-miracles, by supposing imposture on the one hand, and credulity or the influence of imagination on the other, finds only a somewhat difficult application in the case of Mr Greatrakes. The obviously disinterested character of this man, the extent of his practisings, and the attestations which they obtained from some of the most astute persons of his age, make it difficult to suppose either wilful deception or a too easy belief ; and yet in what other solution shall we take refuge? We may at least be certain that, if any other solution be ever discovered for these apparent mysteries, it will be a natural one—the operation of some law, possibly, which shews itself rarely, and which may not become a part of ascertained science for several ages to come.

THE SEVEN MEN OF GLENMORRISTON.

IN the extraordinary history of the wanderings of Prince Charles Stuart after the battle of Culloden, it is a part of peculiar interest, in which he is described as being succoured and faithfully protected for several weeks by a band of robbers. The civilised man of the present day is astonished to consider that, at the time when Sir Robert Walpole, speaking from his experiences amongst English gentlemen, declared every man to have his price, seven outlaws were found in the wilds of Inverness-shire, who had virtue enough to resist a bribe of L.30,000. Remarkable as this part of the history is, it is that which has been perhaps most obscurely related; a result probably of the difficulty which must have been experienced by contemporary writers in obtaining proper information.

It must be premised that, towards the close of July 1746, after more than three months of incredible hardship, Charles found himself amongst the hills between Glenmoriston and Strathglass, in Inverness-shire. He was attended by two or three faithful adherents, to whom he had recently confided himself, the principal being Macdonald of Glenaladale, who had been a major in his army. Late in the evening of the 28th, they reached the highest, and consequently safest point amongst the hills, where, though drenched with rain, the Prince could get no better lodging than a small chink in a rock, which gave him scarcely room to stretch himself, and where he had no fire, no food, and not the slightest comfort of any kind but a pipe of tobacco. At this time, a great quantity of troops were quartered at Fort Augustus, in the centre of the county, and large parties daily scoured the glens, to lay waste the property of the disaffected, and use their best endeavours to capture the Prince. The Duke of Cumberland had given them the significant order, with a view to the stability of his father's dynasty, 'to make no prisoners.'

Charles had scarcely at any former period been in greater danger than now, and at no former time were his personal sufferings so great. It chanced that, a day or two before, there had been added to his party a Glengarry man, who had fled from the soldiery for his life, after they had put his father to death. This particular act of cruelty, by sending the Glengarry man in the way of the Prince, had an effect very different from what the soldiery could have contemplated, for it was the means of his being introduced to the seven Glenmoriston men, who protected him effectually for the ensuing three weeks. At three in the morning of the 29th, the Glengarry man went with Glenaladale's brother to find out these men, and to negotiate for their receiving the distressed party under their care, but without the name of the Prince being mentioned. It was also Charles's wish, by their means, to make inquiry respecting a French vessel which he understood had come to Pollew, on the west coast of Ross-shire, in order to carry him off. Some hours afterwards, by appointment, the party, including the Prince, met the two messengers on the top of a neighbouring hill, to learn what success had attended the mission. The men had been found, and had agreed to take charge of the distressed party, the chief man of whom they understood to be Glenaladale. The party was to repair to a cave called Coiragholt, in the braes of Glenmoriston, where the men undertook to meet them before a particular hour. Charles, accordingly, set out for this place, attended by Glenaladale, the brother of that gentleman, a son of Macdonald of Borodale, the Glengarry man, and two boys.

The men who had promised to entertain the party were only in a modified sense ‘robbers.’ They had been out in the rebellion, and had consequently seen their little possessions in Glenmorriston become a prey to the spoiler. About seventy of their fellow-dalesmen, who had been induced to obey an order of the Duke of Cumberland, for surrendering their arms at Inverness, had been seized and thrust on shipboard, to be deported to the colonies. These men, determined not to be dealt with after the same manner, had entered into an association of offence and defence against the Duke and his army, binding themselves, by solemn oath, never to yield; to fight on any particular emergency to the last drop of their blood; and never, till the day of their death, to give up their arms. At first, they were seven in number—namely, Patrick Grant, a farmer, commonly called Black Peter of Craskie; John Macdonell, alias Campbell; Alexander Macdonell; Alexander, Donald, and Hugh Chisholm, brothers; and Gregor Macgregor. Afterwards, in the course of their marches with the Prince, an eighth, Hugh Macmillan, joined them, and took their oath. They lived at this time a wild life amongst the mountains, supplying themselves with necessaries chiefly by bold attacks upon the military parties from whom they often retrieved cattle and other spoil.

It was into the hands of such men that the fugitive Prince was now to pass. At the appointed time, he and his friends approached the cave of Coiraghoth, where only three of the men at this time were—namely, the two Macdonells and Alexander Chisholm. Glenaladale went forward to converse with them, and hinted that he had young Clanranald in his company. They professed that they would be very glad to see young Clanranald, and take all possible care of him. They were then brought out to meet the party; but they had no sooner set eyes upon the person who was to pass for young Clanranald, than they knew him to be the Prince. He was received by them with the greatest demonstrations of fidelity and kindness, and conducted to their cave, where, at Charles’s request, they took an oath, administered by Glenaladale, in the dreadful terms then customary amongst the Highlanders—‘that all the curses the Scriptures did pronounce might come upon them, and all their posterity, if they did not stand firm to the Prince in the greatest dangers, and if they should discover to any person, man, woman, or child, that the Prince was in their keeping, till once his person should be out of danger.’ This oath they kept so well, that not one of them spoke of the Prince having been in their company till a twelvemonth after he had sailed to France. Charles proposed that he and Glenaladale should take a like oath of fidelity to the men—namely, that, if danger should come, they should stand by one another to the last drop of their blood; but the men refused to take this pledge from the Prince and Glenaladale.

Charles now broke a fast of about forty-eight hours, by a refreshment of mutton, butter, and cheese, with some whisky. Next day, the other four, who had been absent in search of provisions, returned with a dead deer and a live ox. These men also knew the Prince at first sight, and took the same oath with the rest. They killed the ox in his presence. They still wanted bread, and only had a little salt; but fresh water was supplied to them in abundance by a spring which glided through the cave.

When the four men had taken the oath, Charles told the whole seven, that they were the first privy-council he had had sworn to him since the battle of Culloden, and that he should never forget them or theirs, ‘if ever he came to his own.’ Hereupon one of them hinted to him, that a priest who used to come amongst them in Glenmorriston, frequently had told them that King Charles II., after his restoration, was not very mindful of his friends. Their guest said he was heartily sorry for that, and hoped he should act differently; for this he gave them his word—the word of a Prince.

Three days of repose and good nourishment in Coirag-hoth recruited the Prince considerably; and being afraid to stay too long in any one place, he and his attendants shifted their quarters (August 2) to another and equally romantic cave about two miles off, named Coirkreaoch,

Here, after taking some food, and planting sentries at proper points of outlook, they made up a bed of heath for the Prince in a small recess resembling a closet opening from the cave. He remained in this cave four days; when, hearing that one Campbell, a captain of militia, and factor to the Earl of Seaforth [a nobleman who had taken the government side] was encamped within four miles of him, he thought proper to remove. On the evening of the 6th, he and his attendants set out in a northerly direction; and by break of day on the 7th, they had passed the height of the country, and come in upon Strathglass, a district belonging to 'the Chisholm.'* In the evening, two of the men who had been left as scouts, brought intelligence that they need be in no apprehension from the factor Campbell for that night; and they then repaired to a neighbouring sheiling, or hut, where, after kindling a fire, and taking some refreshment, they prepared a bed for the Prince, composed of sods, with the grass uppermost, on which he slept soundly the whole night.

He remained in this place two days. During that time, he despatched a messenger to Pollew, to make inquiry respecting some French vessels which were said to have landed there in order to carry him away from Scotland. That he might be ready to take advantage of these vessels, if it should be found that they had not sailed, he resolved to draw somewhat nearer to the west coast. His messenger, before setting out, had been appointed to bring him intelligence to a particular place, judged convenient for the purpose. Early in the morning of the 9th, he and his friends and attendants, about a dozen persons in all, set out to the northward by an unfrequented moor-road, and came that night to a sheiling, where they halted for a few hours. At two o'clock in the morning of the 10th, they once more addressed themselves to their journey, and at noon came to Glencannich, where they passed the remainder of the day in a wood, and at night repaired to a neighbouring hamlet. At two o'clock in the morning, they left this village, and climbed a hill called Peinachy-rine, on the north side of Glencannich, where they passed the day, and sent off two of their party to obtain a fresh supply of provisions. This place, which is about forty Highland miles from Pollew, is the most northerly point which the Prince reached on the mainland. At night, they repaired to a sheiling, in which they remained two days, waiting for the return of the messenger. At the end of that time, the man rejoined them, with intelligence that the only vessel which had ever touched at Pollew had sailed again, leaving a couple of men, who had set out for Locheil's country in quest of the Prince. Anxious to know if these men had any dispatches for him, he resolved to return towards Locheil's country, in order, if possible, to meet them.

They set out at night (August 13), and recrossing the water of Cannich, and passing near young Chisholm's house, arrived about two in the morning at a place called Fassanacoill, in Strathglass. Here it was thought proper to tarry, until scouts should bring back intelligence of the state of the country to the south, and if the search for him was over in that quarter, and the troops returned to Fort Augustus. While the scouts were absent, the party remained in a dense wood, completely concealed from the neighbouring people. They were supplied with provisions by one John Chisholm, a farmer, who had been in the insurgent army, but to whom they did not at first confide the secret of the Prince being of the party. Charles having at length expressed a wish to see Chisholm, Patrick Grant and another were despatched to bring him. They desired him to come along with them, to see 'a friend whom they knew he would like well to see.' Apprehending from this that they had a person of some consequence with them, he said he had a bottle of wine which a priest had left with him, and he should be glad to take it along with him. 'What! John,' said Grant, 'have you had a bottle of wine all this time, and not given it to us before?'

On coming into the presence of the Prince, John knew him at first sight. Patrick Grant, according to his own simple recital, put the bottle of wine into the Prince's hands, and requested him to drink to him; 'for,' said he, 'I do not remember that your Royal Highness has drunk to me since you came among our hands.' 'Accordingly, the Prince put the bottle of wine to his mouth, and drank a health to Patrick Grant and all friends. John Chisholm, having received good payment for any provisions he had furnished, and finding that they had been purchased for the use of his Prince, immediately offered to return the whole price, and pressed the thing much; but the Prince would not hear of it at all, and ordered him to keep the money.' Chisholm took the same oath as the Glenmorriston men.

Some traits of the Prince's personal condition and conduct while with the Glenmorriston men, as reported by Patrick Grant, may be appreciated by those who still regard with a feeling of melancholy interest the tale of the last Stuart. His clothes, which were of the Highland fashion, were coarse, tattered, and squalid, almost beyond description, and he constantly slept in them, seldom getting a clean shirt above once a fortnight. He suffered, from this, the usual annoying consequences. Notwithstanding this and other bodily afflictions, 'he bore up under all his misfortunes with great resolution and cheerfulness, never murmuring or complaining of the hardness and severity of his condition.' He was observed to make a practice of withdrawing himself every morning and evening to perform his devotions. 'Glenaladale,' said Patrick Grant, 'was interpreter between the Prince and us, and it was agreed upon that we should say nothing but what the Prince should be made to understand, and that the Prince should say nothing but what we likewise should be made to understand. By this means, the Prince discovered that we were much addicted to common swearing in our conversation, for which he caused Glenaladale to reprove us in his [the Prince's] name; and at last the Prince, by his repeated reproofs, prevailed on us so far that we gave that custom of swearing quite up.' Patrick Grant stated that the Prince walked so nimbly in the day-time, that few persons could hold out with him ; but he did not travel so well by night, when, being unaccustomed to the rough and boggy ground on the Highland hills, he was constantly getting himself immersed in some deep hole, from which his companions had to draw him out. All the time he was with the Glenmorriston men, his appetite was observed to be good. When the party were at their meals, they sat in a circle, each having his morsel on his knee. The Prince would never allow them to keep off their bonnets when in his company—probably a precaution against his rank being detected, in the event of any hostile party approaching them before they were aware. He used to give directions about their homely cookery, and sometimes tended a roast himself.

It would appear that not exactly everything said by the men was interpreted to the royal wanderer. After he had parted with them, and got into new hands, conversing about these faithful adherents, he spoke of one in particular as an uncommonly clever fellow, stating that the name this man bore among his companions was Ho Sian. In reality, this expression was Aos Ian, 'Hark you, John,' which they often had occasion to use to John Macdonell, perhaps the ablest of their number, and one to whose judgment they usually deferred in all important matters. It will amuse the reader to learn that Mr Forbes, with true Jacobite feeling, adopted the mistaken phrase of the Prince, and advised Macdonell to assume it as his ordinary name, and hand it down to his children.

In due time, the spies returned with intelligence, that the troops had returned to their camp at Fort Augustus, and that there was consequently a prospect of the Prince being able to execute his design of crossing the Great Glen, and joining Locheil in Badenoch. They therefore set out at six in the morning of the 17th, and, travelling by an unfrequented road, at ten in the forenoon reached the braes of Glenmorriston. Having passed the day on the top of a hill, they set out at night, but had not travelled above a mile, when they learned that a strong military party had been sent to the braes of Glengarry, in quest of the Prince. Upon this, it was resolved to proceed no farther, until the motions of the enemy should be further known ; and they repaired to a neighbouring sheiling, where they passed the remainder of the night. In the morning of the 18th, three men were sent off towards Loch Arkaig, in Locheil's country, two of whom were to seek out, and, if possible, form an appointment for the Prince with Cameron of Clunes ; while the other was to turn at Glengarry, and bring back intelligence of the movements of the party said to be in that district, so that Charles might perhaps be able to proceed even while the meeting with Clunes was in the way of being arranged.

We have here a remarkable anecdote of the Prince, which may be best related in the language in which Mr Forbes has reported it from the mouth of Patrick Grant. When returned to Glenmorriston Braes—‘The Prince was pretty positive to proceed forwards sooner than the Glenmorriston men thought it safe for him ; and they would by no means allow him to go, till they should think it safe for him so to do. In a word, the kind contention ran so high, that they threatened to turn their backs upon him, and to leave him, if he did not listen to their counsel, as they knew the country best, and what dangers might happen to him in it ; and immediately insisted upon his taking some little refreshment and rest, and staying thereto as long as they judged it safe for him. But the Prince refused to eat or to drink, because they would not do as he desired. Upon this, they plainly told him, that if he did not eat and drink heartily, he could not well hold out with the fatigues he was obliged to undergo in his present situation ; that if he should happen to turn faintish by abstaining from meat and drink too long, and then danger should come nigh them, he would not be in a condition either to get away from it, or to act his part in any shape so well as he would wish to do ; and therefore they urged him more than ever—as being absolutely necessary for him—to take some refreshment and rest, which accordingly he did. The Prince said : “ I find kings and princes must be ruled by their privy-council, but I believe there is not in all the world a more absolute privy-council than what I have at present,” &c. They added, they had rather tie him than comply with him, so well did they know his danger. The Prince was at last obliged to yield the point, as he found them positive to the last degree, and as they assured him, if he complied with their requests in behalf of his safety, the enemy should not get within two miles of him without being discovered. “ This was the only time,” said Patrick Grant, “ that we ever differed with the Prince in any one thing, and we were very sorry for it.” It is distressing to think that, on the very day when Charles was acting thus unreasonably with his humble but faithful followers on the braes of Glenmorriston, the brave Balmerino and the gentle Kilmarnock were laying down their lives in his cause on the ensanguined scaffold of Tower-Hill.

While the party rested at this place, Patrick Grant and Alexander Chisholm went out to forage for provisions, and in the course of their walk, met the Laird of Glenmorriston (Grant), who had been in the Prince’s army, and had had his house burnt and his lands pillaged in consequence. Glenmorriston asked them where they now lived, as they were seldom seen—what they were doing—and how did they obtain the means of subsistence. ‘ What is become,’ said he, ‘ of the Prince ? I have heard that he has passed the braes of Knoydart.’ Even to this gentleman, whom habit had trained them to regard with the greatest respect, they would not disclose any of their secrets, merely remarking that, as the enemy were plundering the country, it were a pity not to share in the spoil ; and that they accordingly did so, and made a shift to live upon it. On their return to the Prince, they informed him of this interview, and said that, if his Royal Highness pleased, they would bring Glenmorriston to see him, he being a faithful and trusty friend. ‘ The Prince said, he was so well pleased with his present guard, that he wanted none other ; and that he had experienced poor folks to be as faithful and firm as any men, rich or high, could be.

On the 19th, the man who was to bring intelligence from Glengarry came back, reporting that that district was clear of troops. The Prince, therefore, with his party, now ten in number, set out in the afternoon, under the benefit of a fog, and passing through Glenmorriston and the minor vale of Glenluing, arrived late at night on the braes of Glengarry. When they came to the Garry Water, it was found breast-deep with the rain ; nevertheless, they crossed it in safety, and ascending the hill for about a mile, tarried there for the remainder of the night, in the open air, notwithstanding that it rained heavily. Early in the morning (August 20), the heavy rain still continuing, they advanced six Highland miles across hills and moors ; and about ten in the forenoon came to the hill above Auchnasaul, where the two messengers had been appointed to meet them on their return from Cameron of Clunes. They passed the day in a most inconvenient habitation, ‘it raining as heavy within as without.’ Towards the afternoon, after they had begun to despair of the return of their messengers, and were deliberating what should be done, the two men came in, bringing a message from Clunes to Glenaladale, to the effect that he could not wait upon him immediately, but had directed that the party should lodge for that night in a certain wood two miles off, where he would meet them in the morning.

Two of the men, Patrick Grant and Alexander Macdonell, were now despatched to reconnoitre their proposed lodging-place; and finding it suitable, they quickly returned to bring forward the party. Their provisions were now reduced to half a peck of meal, and they had starvation staring them in the face. By the greatest good-fortune, Patrick shot a large hart at the place where they were to pass the night; so that when the Prince and the rest arrived, they had one of the finest meals they had as yet enjoyed.

Charles now fell under the care of other friends, and some days after dismissed all the Glenmorriston men except one, Patrick Grant, whom he kept for some time longer, and carried along with him, but only till he had got his purse replenished, so as to be able to send his preservers a pecuniary acknowledgment of their services. Grant returned to their haunt in Glenmorriston with twenty-four guineas, being at the rate of three guineas to each man.

The Glenmorriston men remained for some time longer in arms against the government, but ultimately resumed their ordinary occupations. It has often been stated, that one of them came to be hanged for stealing a cow ; but this is a mistake, arising from a person of the same name as one of them having pretended to be the Glenmorriston man, in order to excite interest in his behalf, when condemned to that fate in 1754. Hugh Chisholm survived to 1812, and to the last day of his life would never allow any one to shake his right hand—that hand having been honoured with the royal gripe on parting from Prince Charles.

REAL HISTORY OF A SLAVE-BOY.

It is a pleasant sight to behold the labour of cane-cutting in the summer season, on the plantation fields of Antigua, one of the sweetest of all the fertile spots of earth in the Spanish main. So at least thought Mr Henry Paget, as he rode slowly behind the row of chattering negroes, male and female, busy at the task we have mentioned, on his aunt's estate, which the young gentleman had come all the way from England to visit, and in some respects to put in order. As he gazed on the scene before him, he almost felt sorry at the thought of his approaching departure, to rejoin his family in Britain. With their large cutting-bills in their hands, a long line of white-jacketed and white-wrapped blacks were lopping off the stalks of the sugar-canæs, dividing them into several portions, and laying them down in regular heaps as they went along. Others, again, behind these cutters, were busy binding up the strewed canæs into bundles. Here and there, some female negro had her little chubby child tottering about her feet, or assisting her to arrange the canæs into proper parcels. All these workers were stout, healthy, and particularly happy, if the ringing laughter they ever and anon set forth, while the white glancing teeth were seen through their wide-extended mouths, could be taken as indicating a state of happiness for the time. As Henry Paget gazed on the dusky labourers, a pleasing feeling sprang up in his mind, for he felt the consciousness that his own visit had conduced greatly to the comfort which he saw. And the negroes also were conscious of this, as any one might have learned, had he been near enough to hear the many ‘Bless him young massa’s!’ that were addressed to the rider, sometimes loudly, and sometimes in the tones of half-unconscious ejaculation, from the mouths of both men and women in the band.

Mr Paget, after a time, left the scene, in order to take a ride along the borders of some of the neighbouring plantations. The day was hot, but the country being well wooded, he was shaded from the sun’s heat in his progress, at one time by the drooping and feathery branches of the picturesque palm, and at another by the thick foliage of the lofty cabbage-tree. Of all the productions of these islands, this latter tree is perhaps the most extraordinary. Its long trunk, rising to the height of fifty feet without a branch, and its dense crest of broad leaves above, make it somewhat resemble the humble vegetable after which it is named; but the resemblance is more remarkable in another respect. On the very top of every cabbage-tree, and in the very centre of that top, there exists a heart—and only one heart—some foot or two in height and breadth, and bearing the strongest likeness, in appearance, taste, and smell, to the heart or pith of a common cabbage,

But we must not digress too much upon natural objects, our business being to attend to what befell Mr Henry Paget in his ride. After he had wandered to a considerable distance from his own property, he chanced, when on the outskirts of a plantation not known to him, to hear, as he thought, a woman's cries at no great distance from him. Cantering smartly in the direction of the sounds, he saw, after turning the corner of a clump of palms, not a woman, but a black boy crying bitterly under the lash of a grown - up negro, beside whom stood a white overseer. Moved at the sufferings of the child, who did not seem to be above seven or eight years old, Mr Paget rode up, and asked 'what the boy had done.' The overseer, who seemed to know the querist by sight, touched his cap, and replied: 'The little rascal was running away, sir.'

'Why, a boy so young as this could not think of making his escape from his owners?' said Mr Paget.

'O no! massa—no run way! Berry bad him foot—lilly sore,' cried the boy, fixing on Mr Paget a look of most pathetic and intelligent entreaty, such as Henry thought he had seldom seen on a face before, though the one before him was black as the raven's wing. The poor creature pointed, at the time he spoke, to his foot.

'If your foot had been sore, you little scoundrel,' exclaimed the surly overseer, 'you could not have been here. Get home. Put the lash to him, Mingo, and he'll go fast enough.'

Perceiving the boy to sink to the ground, instead of running away, when the negro held up the lash, Mr Paget leaped from his horse, and asked him to desist for a moment. He then looked at the boy's foot, and found the ankle to be most severely swelled. On being asked, the poor little fellow told Mr Paget, that, his mother being 'berry, berry sick' at home, he had run to the woods between work - hours to gather some 'yarb' that she wished, and that, in his haste, he had fallen and hurt his foot so much that he could not walk.

Mr Paget could not help feeling considerably interested in the case of the boy, partly from the filial tenderness which his mishap betrayed, and partly from his intelligent-looking countenance. He thought he had never seen a more pleasing physiognomy among the negro race. The overseer, meanwhile, was impatient.

' You must not trust to all, sir,' said he, ' that these cunning imps say, simple as they seem.'

' I trust so much to what this boy says, sir,' replied Mr Paget, ' that I will buy him from you, if you have the power to dispose of him.'

' I have no such authority,' said the man shortly.

Henry then inquired who managed the estate, and found that a Mr Carr had the direction, in the absence of the proprietors, who had long been non-residents. Not to dwell unnecessarily on this matter, we may briefly state, that, before returning home, Mr Paget, impelled by a feeling of interest for which he could scarcely account, had seen this gentleman, and purchased the boy, who had, in the interval, been carried home by the negro attendant on the overseer. In a few days afterwards, the boy, having recovered from his sprain, was an inmate of his new master's house. He had wept at parting from his parents, but they shed no tears themselves, being too glad to see him removed from an estate on which, as experience had taught them, he would have been hardly used, probably through life. In his new place, the little African got the name of Cæsar Paget, according to a custom often followed in the West Indies, of naming young slaves after their owners.

The negro boy thus accidentally rescued by Mr Paget—at the cost, it may be observed, of a very large sum—proved, as his purchaser had anticipated, to be gifted with uncommonly lively parts, and with great docility and affectionateness of disposition. So much, indeed, was Mr Paget struck with the promise of the lad, that, on setting out for England, a short time after the incident described, he took little Cæsar with him. Several circumstances concurred in making this voyage across the Atlantic a most fortunate thing for the boy, not only in its ultimate, but in its immediate consequences. Having always, from his connection with a West Indian property, felt a strong interest in the question of the negro capabilities for intellectual culture, Mr Paget took a pleasure, while at sea, in promoting and watching the development of Cæsar's mind, finding therein an excellent amusement for his unoccupied time. Very little instruction of any kind had been given to the boy before, but he rapidly profited by that which his kind master deigned to bestow on him; and thus solved for his teacher the problem of negro improbability, which Lott Cary, Thomas Jenkins, and Phillis Wheatley, may have solved for others.

The facility with which the young African imbibed the common rudiments of education during the voyage, induced Mr Paget, on reaching his aunt's house in the west of England, to provide Cæsar with continued opportunities of instruction. In short, Cæsar, during several years succeeding his arrival at Pagetville, received a good ordinary education, such as is usually bestowed on the middle-classes of Britain. It was not thrown away on a barren soil. The boy's intelligence and correctness of deportment soon made him very much a favourite with Mrs Paget, the lady of the house, and aunt of his benefactor. It would be superfluous, however, to dwell on this part of our hero's life. Suffice it to say, that, after he had passed the period of boyhood, he became the personal and favourite attendant of his mistress. Subsequently, he advanced in position, as opportunity occurred, until he became house-steward, and was intrusted with the highest charge connected with his lady's household affairs.

Shortly after he was made house-steward, his mistress removed to the neighbourhood of Henley, on the Thames, where she had a small estate, with a mansion attached to it. Here Cæsar continued for several years in the management of the domestic matters of the family, and in the course of this occupation, became known to, and indeed familiarly acquainted with, many of the respectable tradesmen and merchants of the town of Henley. The consequence of this was seen in the course of time. Mrs Paget died. Her oldest nephew, a brother of Cæsar's former friend, fell heir, though never the deceased's favourite, to her English property. Several years before this time, Henry Paget, being in bad health, had returned, for the advantage of warmer air, to the Paget estate in Antigua, which his aunt had latterly disposed to him, being all the landed property she had it in her power to bestow on the nephew she loved. In this situation of things, our friend Cæsar received an invitation from the English heir to continue in his place as major-domo. But he declined the offer for several reasons, though undecided about any other course for the future. Several of his friends in Henley heard of this, and the result was, that a number of the respectable merchants of the place, knowing Cæsar's probity and activity in business matters, strongly recommended him to take advantage of a favourable opening which then occurred, and to engage in trade in Henley. The opening in question was in the coal-trade, which is carried on extensively there. Cæsar took the advice given to him, and became a coal-merchant in Henley.

His late lady had not forgotten in her will the valuable services of her attached African, and Cæsar Paget, as we may now call him without fear of confusion, was therefore enabled to embark in business with a considerable capital. He had also the advantage of having a considerable range of acquaintance, and a good character. Some may perhaps think that he had disadvantages, or at least a disadvantage, to counterbalance the favourable points. But — whether from a particular liberality on the part of the people among whom he found himself placed, or not, we cannot say—certain it is, that Cæsar not only was successful in business, but also in gaining the warm friendship of the most respectable of his fellow-townsman. The colour of his skin became forgotten or unheeded; how completely, the following incident in his career will shew. After our hero had spent a number of fortunate years in business, the chief rival he had in trade died, leaving a young and comely widow behind him. Cæsar was at this time in the prime of confirmed manhood, with a tall, manly person, not inelegantly formed. His colour was, it is true, as black as ink, but his features were as near the European as the African contour. Thus fashioned, Caesar Paget determined to offer himself to the blooming widow, thinking, no doubt, that the junction of the two businesses would be a most excellent thing for all parties. The widow thought so too; or, it may be, Caesar had the address to persuade her of it. However this may be, she married our friend, and, we believe, never had occasion to repent of it, in the course of a long wedded life.

The tastes and manners, indeed, of Caesar Paget may be described, without exaggeration, as those of a cultivated English gentleman. He was a great reader, to use a common phrase, and attached, in particular, to dramatic literature, as also to theatrical amusements. In order to see a favourite actor in a favourite play of Shakspeare, he woud sometimes proceed, expressly on purpose, to the metropolis, accompanied generally by some of his family. In all the cultivated and elegant amusements of Henley, he took a prominent part. In the cricket-clubs, he was an active and cherished associate; and very odd, in truth, it was, to see him on the cricket-field, ‘among the white ones, coloured only he.’ But his fellow-towns-men and cricketers seemed, as has been said, to have utterly forgotten, in the course of time, the existence of such a circumstance as his peculiarity of hue. From his speech, nothing could be detected to indicate him other than a well-educated native of the country in which he lived.

Thus, possessed of wealth and comfort, surrounded by a happy family, esteemed by friends and employers, and enjoying as well as appreciating all the elegant and refined pleasures of civilised life, did he, who was in youth a poor slave-boy of Antigua, spend his advanced years. What a change—what a revolution—in his existing circumstances and probable fate, was produced by that stumble amid the Antiguan palm-trees—which caused the sprain in the ankle—which caused him to be lashed—which caused him to cry—which caused Mr Henry Paget to come to the spot— which, finally, caused the liberation of the boy! These, at least, form the chain of circumstances by which the change was wrought out; but the true proximate cause of the whole, was the filial affection implanted by the Creator in the boy's nature, which led him to risk the lash for the procuring of a little good to his poor mother. With this moral, the old story-books would certainly have concluded a history like this; and though they too often left out of account, in doing so, all the after-propriety of conduct necessary to consummate the good attained by the first act, yet, as the failing of the old narrators leaned to virtue's side, we are content that filial affection should be regarded as the origin of Cæsar Paget's remarkable success in life. At the same time, we cannot help fearing that similar inlets to success have fallen in the way of many individuals, both white and black, without proving of any permanent avail, because the persevering industry and activity were absent which were required to make 'the thread into a tether.' Cæsar Paget possessed these qualities, and all who would imitate his course must imitate them.

ANECDOTES OF MUSICIANS.

MUSIC, in its highest degrees of endowment, produces effects in the human character, of which the least that can be said is, that they are as worthy of being studied as any other class of mental phenomena. One of the most remarkable circumstances attending the gift in its loftiest forms, is the absolute impossibility of repressing it. Even during childhood, it is quite in vain, in most instances, to attempt to impose upon it the least control. In spite of the injunctions, the vigilance, the tyranny of masters and parents, the 'unprisoned soul' of the musician seems always to find some means of escape; and even when debarred from the use of musical instruments, it is ten to one but in the end he is discovered ensconced in some quiet corner, tuning his horse-shoes, or, should he be so fortunate as to secure so great a prize, like Eulenstein, eliciting new and unknown powers of harmony from the iron tongue of a Jew's harp. Some curious examples of the extent to which this ruling passion has been carried occasionally occur. Dr Arne (except Purcell, perhaps our greatest English composer) was bred a lawyer, and as such articled to an attorney; but his musical propensities, which shewed themselves at a very early age, soon engrossed his mind to the exclusion of everything else. He used not unfrequently to avail himself of the privilege of a servant, by borrowing a livery, and going to the upper gallery of the Opera-house, at that time appropriated to domestics. It is also said, that he used to hide a spinet in his room, upon which, after muffling the strings with a handkerchief, he practised during the night; for had his father known what was going forward, he probably would have thrown both him and it out of the window. The latter, however, never appears to have come to a knowledge of these proceedings; and his son, instead of studying law, was devoting himself entirely to the cultivation of the spinet, the violin, and musical composition, until one day, after he had served out his time, when he happened to call at the house of a gentleman in the neighbourhood, who was engaged with a musical party, when, being ushered into the room, to his utter surprise and horror, he discovered his son in the act of playing the first fiddle; from which period the old gentleman began to think it most prudent to give up the contest, and soon after allowed him to receive regular instructions.

Handel, too, was similarly situated. His father, who was a physician at Halle, in Saxony, destined him for the profession of the law, and with this view was so determined to check his early inclination towards music, that he excluded from his house all musical society; nor would he permit music or musical instruments to be ever heard within its walls. The child, however, notwithstanding his parent's precautions, found means to hear somebody play on the harpsichord ; and the delight which he felt having prompted him to endeavour to gain an opportunity of practising what he had heard, he contrived, through a servant, to procure a small clarichord or spinet, which he secreted in a garret, and to which he repaired every night after the family had gone to rest, and intuitively, without extraneous aid, learned to extract from it its powers of harmony as well as melody. Upon this subject, Mr Hogarth, in his highly popular History of Music, has the following sensible observation :—‘ A childish love for music or painting, even when accompanied with an aptitude to learn something of these arts, is not, in one case out of a hundred, or rather a thousand, conjoined with that degree of genius, without which it would be a vain and idle pursuit. In the general case, therefore, it is wise to check such propensities where they appear like to divert or incapacitate the mind from graver pursuits. But, on the other hand, the judgment of a parent of a gifted child ought to be shewn by his discerning the genuine talent as soon as it manifests itself, and then bestowing on it every care and culture.’

A tale exactly similar is told of Handel’s great contemporary, John Sebastian Bach, a man of equally stupendous genius, and whose works at the present day are looked up to with the same veneration with which we regard those of the former. He was born at Eisenach in 1685, and when ten years old (his father being dead) was left to the care of his elder brother, an organist, from whom he received his first instructions ; but the talent of the pupil so completely outran the slow current of the master’s ideas, that pieces of greater difficulty were perpetually in demand, and as often refused. Among other things, young Bach set his heart upon a book containing pieces for the clarichord, by the most celebrated composers of the day, but the use of it was pointedly refused. It was in vain, however, to repress the youthful ardour of the composer. The book lay in a cupboard, the door of which was of lattice-work ; and as the interstices were large enough to admit his little hand, he soon saw that, by rolling it up, he could withdraw and replace it at pleasure ; and having found his way thither during the night, he set about copying it, and, having no candle, he could only work by moonlight ! In six months, however, his task was completed ; but just as he was on the point of reaping the harvest of his toils, his brother unluckily found out the circumstance, and by an act of the most contemptible cruelty, took the book from him ; and it was not till after his brother's death, which took place some time afterwards, that he recovered it.

The extraordinary proficiency acquired in this art more than in any other, at an age before the intellectual powers are fully expanded, may be regarded as one of the most interesting results of this early and enthusiastic devotion to music. We can easily imagine a child acquiring considerable powers of execution upon a pianoforte—an instrument which demands no great effort of physical strength—and even pouring forth a rich vein of natural melody : but how excellence in composition, in the combination of the powers of harmony and instrumentation—a process which, in adults, is usually arrived at after much labour, regular training, and long study of the best models and means of producing effect—how such knowledge and skill can ever exist in a child, is indeed extraordinary ; still there can be no doubt of the fact. The genius of a Mozart appears and confounds all abstract speculations. When scarcely eight years of age, this incomparable artist, while in Paris on his way to Great Britain, had composed several sonatas for the harpsichord, with violin accompaniments, which were set in a masterly and finished style. Shortly afterwards, when in London, he wrote his first symphony and a set of sonatas, dedicated to the queen. Daines Barrington, speaking of him at this time, says that he appeared to have a thorough knowledge of the fundamental rules of composition, as on giving him a melody, he immediately wrote an excellent bass to it. This he had been in the custom of doing several years previously ; and the minuets and little movements which he composed from the age of four till seven, are said to have possessed a consistency of thought and a symmetry of design which were perfectly surprising. Mr Barrington observes, that at the above period—namely, when Mozart was eight years old — his skill in extemporaneous modulation, making smooth and effective transitions from one key to another, was wonderful ; that he executed these musical difficulties occasionally with a handkerchief over the keys ; and that, with all these displays of genius, his general deportment was entirely that of a child. While he was playing to Mr Barrington, his favourite cat came into the room, upon which he immediately left the instrument to play with it, and could not be brought back for some time ; after which he had hardly resumed his performance, when he started off again, and began running about the room with a stick between his legs for a horse ! At twelve years of age, he wrote his first opera, La Finta Semplice, the score of which contained 558 pages ; but though approved by Hasse and Metastasio, in consequence of a cabal among the performers, it was never represented. He wrote also, at the same age, a mass, Offertorium, &c. the performance of which he conducted himself. The precocity of Handel, though not quite so striking, was nearly so. At nine years of age, he composed some motets of such merit, that they were adopted in the service of the church ; and about the same age, Purcell, when a singing-boy, produced several anthems so beautiful, that they have been preserved, and are still sung in our cathedrals. ‘To beings like these,’ Mr Hogarth observes, ‘music seems to have no rules. What others consider the most profound and learned combinations, are with them the dictates of imagination and feeling, as much as the simplest strains of melody.’

Mozart’s early passion for arithmetic is well known, and to the last, though extremely improvident in his affairs, he was very fond of figures, and singularly clever in making calculations. Storace, a contemporary and kindred genius, who died in his thirty-third year, and whose English operas are among the few of the last century which still continue to hold their place on our stage, had the same extraordinary turn for calculation. We are not aware whether this can be shewn to be a usual concomitant of musical genius; but, if it can, the coincidence might lead to much curious metaphysical inquiry. Certain it is, that there exists a connection between that almost intuitive perception of the relation of numbers with which some individuals are gifted, and that faculty of the mind which applies itself to the intervals of the musical scale, the distribution of the chords, their effect separately and in combination, and the adjustment of the different parts of a score. It is by no means improbable, that, owing to some such subtlety of perception, Mozart was enabled to work off an infinitely greater variety and multitude of compositions, in every branch of the art, before he had reached his thirty-sixth year, in which he was cut off, than has ever been produced by any composer within the same space of time, and with a degree of minute scientific accuracy which has disarmed all criticism, and defied the most searching examination.

Nevertheless, there is seldom anything wonderful which is not exaggerated, and many absurd stories have been circulated in regard to these efforts; among others, that the overture to Don Giovanni was composed during the night preceding its first performance. This piece was certainly written down in one night, but it cannot be said to have been composed in that short space of time. The facts are as follow:—He had put off the writing till eleven o'clock of the night before the intended performance, after he had spent the day in the fatiguing business of the rehearsal. His wife sat by him to keep him awake. ‘He wrote,’ says Mr Hogarth, ‘while she ransacked her memory for the fairy tales of her youth, and all the humorous and amusing stories she could think of. As long as she kept him laughing till the tears ran down his cheeks, he got on rapidly; but if she was silent for a moment, he dropped asleep. Seeing at last that he could hold out no longer, she persuaded him to lie down for a couple of hours. At five in the morning, she awoke him ; and at seven, when the copyists appeared, the score was completed. Mozart was not in the habit of composing with the pen in his hand : his practice was not merely to form in his mind a sketch or outline of a piece of music, but to work it well, and complete it in all its parts ; and it was not till this was done that he committed it to paper, which he did with rapidity, even when surrounded by his friends, and joining in their conversation. There can be no doubt that the overture to Don Giovanni existed fully in his mind when he sat down to write it the night before its performance ; and even then, his producing with such rapidity a score for so many instruments, so rich in harmony and contrivance, indicates a strength of conception and a power of memory altogether wonderful.' In truth, Mozart's whole life would seem to have consisted of little more than a succession of musical reveries. He was very absent, and in answering questions, appeared to be always thinking about something else. Even in the morning, when he washed his hands, he never stood still, but used to walk up and down the room. At dinner, also, he was apparently lost in meditation, and not in the least aware of what he did. During all this time, the mental process was constantly going on ; and he himself, in a letter to a friend, gives the following interesting explanation of his habits of composition :—

' When once I become possessed of an idea, and have begun to work upon it, it expands, becomes methodised and defined, and the whole piece stands almost finished and complete in my mind, so that I can survey it, like a fine picture or a beautiful statue, at a glance. Nor do I hear in my imagination the parts successively, but I hear them, as it were, all at once : the delight which this gives me I cannot express. All this inventing, this producing, takes place in a pleasing lively dream ; but the actual bearing of the whole is, after all, the greatest enjoyment. What has been thus produced, I do not easily forget ; and this is perhaps the most precious gift for which I have to be thankful. When I proceed to write down my ideas, I take out of the bag of my memory, if I may use the expression, what has previously been collected in the way I have mentioned. For this reason, the committing to paper is done quickly enough ; for everything, as I said before, is already finished, and rarely differs on paper from what it was in my imagination.'

Apart from his musical triumphs, the personal character of Mozart is deeply interesting. From his earliest childhood, it seemed to be his perpetual endeavour to conciliate the affections of those around him ; in truth, he could not bear to be otherwise than loved. The gentlest, the most docile and obedient of children, even the fatigues of a whole day's performance would never prevent him from continuing to play or practise, if his father desired it. When scarcely more than an infant, we are told that every night, before going to bed, he used to sing a little air which he had composed on purpose, his father having placed him standing in a chair, and singing the second to him ; he was then, but not till then, laid in bed perfectly contented and happy. Throughout the whole of his career, he seemed to live much more for the sake of others than for himself. His great object at the outset was to relieve the necessities of his parents ; afterwards, his generosity towards his professional brethren, and the impositions practised by the designing on his open and unsuspecting nature, brought on difficulties ; and, finally, those exertions, so infinitely beyond his strength, which in the ardour of his affection for his wife and children, and in order to save them from impending destitution, he was prompted to use, destroyed his health, and hurried him to an untimely grave.

Mozart was extremely pious. In a letter written in his youth from Augsburg, he says : 'I pray every day that I may do honour to myself and to Germany—that I may earn money, and be able to relieve you from your present distressed state. When shall we meet again, and live happily together ?' It is not difficult to identify these sentiments with the author of the sublimest and most expressive piece of devotional music which the genius of man has ever consecrated to his Maker. Haydn also was remarkable for his deep sense of religion. ‘When I was engaged in composing the Creation,’ he used to say, ‘I felt myself so penetrated with religious feeling, that before I sat down to write, I earnestly prayed to God that he would enable me to praise him worthily.’ It is related also of Handel, that he used to express the great delight which he felt in setting to music the most sublime passages of Holy Writ, and that the habitual study of the Scriptures had a strong influence upon his sentiments and conduct.

T H E   W A N D E R I N G   J E W .

THERE is something so striking and impressive in the idea of a human creature being doomed to wander perpetually over the earth, restless and without hope of rest, deprived of the prospect of peace which the grave holds out to all other terrestrial beings fated to outlive every social tie, and to see generation after generation, of descendants it may be, passing away successively from before his eyes — there is something so striking in the idea of such a lot, that it is no wonder mankind should have had their interest strongly excited by the legend of the Wandering Jew, and that the subject should have been a favourite one with the lovers of poetry and romance. To fanaticism and imposture, the fiction has held out equal temptations. At various periods since the commencement of the Christian era, individuals have assumed the character of the Wandering Jew, and have succeeded in attracting notice, and gaining credence, to a greater or less extent, from their wondering contemporaries.

It is extremely probable that this legend had its origin in the words used by Christ to the Apostle Peter, on the

The wicked Jews with scoffes and scornes
 Did daily him molest,
 That never till he left his life,
 Our Saviour could get rest.
 When they had crowned his head with thornes,
 And scourged him to disgrace,
 In scornful sort they led him forthe
 Unto his dying place :
 His own dear cross he bore himselfe,
 A burthen far too great,
 Which made him in the street to faint,
 With blood and water sweat.

Being wearey thus, he sought for rest,
 To ease his burthened soule,
 Upon a stone ; the which a wretch
 Did churlishly controul ;
 And sayd : " Awaye, thou king of Jews,
 Thou shalt not rest thee here !
 Pass on : thy execution place,
 Thou seest, nowe draweth neare."
 And thereupon he thrust him thence ;
 At which our Saviour sayd :
 " I sure will rest, but thou shalt walk,
 And have no journey stayed."

From this hour forward, the ballad continues to say, this 'cursed shoemaker' could find no peace anywhere ; and, finally, being brought to conviction by his own fate, became a convert and a witness for the religion of him who had pronounced his doom.

* He hath past through many a foreigne place,
 Arabia, Egypt, Africa,
 Greece, Syria, and great Thrace,
 And throughout all Hungaria :
 And lately in Bohemia,
 With many a German towne ;
 And now in Flanders, as 'tis thought,
 He wandereth up and downe.
 Wheres learned men with him conferre,
 Of those his lingering dayes,
 And wonder much to hear him tell
 His journeys and his wayes..

All the alms given to him, the ballad further says, he gave to the poor, and no man ever saw laugh or smile upon his face.

The conferences with learned men mentioned in the ballad are no fiction of the minstrel's brain, as we learn from the work called the Turkish Spy, where an account is given of the impression made on the Parisian savans by the appearance among them of another Wandering Jew. Though the plan of this work is fictitious, like that of the Citizen of the World, for example, yet the incidents narrated in it are in most instances real, and such is the case with the following story of the Wandering Jew, who figured in Paris about the year 1643:—‘Here is a man come to this city, if he may be called a man, who pretends to have lived about these sixteen hundred years. He says of himself, that he was usher of the divan (the Jews call it the Court of Judgment) in Jerusalem at the time when Jesus, the Christian Messias, was condemned by Pontius Pilate, the Roman president; that his name was Michob-Ader; and that, for thrusting Jesus out of the hall, with these words: “Go, why tarriest thou?” the Messias answered him again: “I go, but tarry thou till I come;” thereby condemning him to live till the day of judgment.’ Such was the account given by this personage of himself. He affected to heal diseases by a touch, and was deeply venerated both by the common people and others. ‘One day,’ says the Turkish Spy, ‘I had the curiosity to discourse with him in several languages, and I found him master of all those that I could speak. He told me that there was scarce a true history to be found. He was in Rome, he said, when Nero set fire to the city, and saw him stand triumphing on the top of a hill to behold its flames. He saw Saladin’s return from his conquest in the East, when he caused his shirt to be carried on the top of a spear with this proclamation: “Saladin, lord of many rich countries, shall have no memorial left of all his glories when he dies, but only this poor shirt!” He knew Tamerlane the Scythian, and told me that he was so called because he was lame. He seemed to pity the insupportable calamity of Bajazet, whom he had seen carried about in a cage by Tamerlane’s order. He knew Mohammed’s father very well, and had been often in his company at Ormus. He had heard the emperor

Vespasian say, when he understood the temple of Solomon was burnt to ashes, “he had rather all Rome had been set on fire.” Here the old man fell a-weeping himself, lamenting the ruin of that noble structure, which he described to me as familiarly as if he had seen it but yesterday.’

This was, the reader will admit, a goodly range of experience for any one to lay claim to. The appearance of this personator of the Wandering Jew corresponded with his assumptions. ‘By his looks, one would take him for a relic of the old world, or one of the long-lived fathers before the flood. To speak modestly, he may pass for the younger brother of Time.’

Another Wandering Jew, and one of equal learning, seems to have excited the wonder of the people of Venice, in the year 1687. This new one was more remarkable than the others, in as far as he is said to have made no boast of his antiquity, but to have felt hurt, on the contrary, when it was accidentally discovered. ‘This personage,’ says the author of Hermippus Redivivus, ‘went by the name of Signor Gualdi. He remained at Venice some months, and three things were remarked in his conduct. The first was, that he had a small collection of fine pictures, which he readily shewed to anybody that desired it; the next, that he was perfectly versed in all arts and sciences, and spoke on every subject with such readiness and sagacity, as astonished all who heard him; and it was, in the third place, observed that he never wrote or received any letter; never desired any credit, or made use of bills of exchange, but paid for everything in ready money, and lived decently, though not in splendour.’ The story then goes on to tell, that a Venetian nobleman, an admirable judge of paintings, was admitted to see Gualdi’s collection, and admired them excessively. At the close of the visit, the nobleman ‘cast his eye by chance over the chamber-door, where hung a picture of this stranger (Gualdi.) The Venetian looked upon it, and then upon him. “This picture was drawn for you, sir,” says he to Signor Gualdi, to which the other made no answer but by a low bow. "You look," continued the Venetian, "like a man of fifty, and yet I know this picture to be of the hand of Titian, who has been dead one hundred and thirty years. How is this possible?" "It is not easy," said Signor Gualdi gravely, "to know all things that are possible; but there is certainly no crime in my being like a picture drawn by Titian." The Venetian easily perceived, by his manner of speaking, that he had given the stranger offence, and therefore took his leave. The issue of the affair was, that the Venetian told the matter to all his friends. Curiosity was aroused, and various parties went to call upon Gualdi. They were disappointed, however; the stranger had left the city, and was never seen again.

Of course, the world of Venice came to the conclusion, that this personage could be none else but the Wandering Jew, or a philosopher who had been fortunate enough to discover the elixir of life. The matter is certainly capable of a much easier solution, however, and Gualdi's own words afford a ready clue to it. It was on this story, Godwin tells us, that he founded his novel of St Leon, a work of great power and beauty. We have already mentioned the existence of numerous works of fiction which have a similar basis. Of all these, the most interesting, perhaps, is the Rev. George Croly's tale of Salathiel. Mrs Norton's poem of the Undying One deserves especial mention also among the compositions which this legend has suggested.

Those readers who are not wearied by this subject, will find other impostors who have personated this imaginary Wanderer, pointed out in Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible. In the meantime, we shall conclude by quoting a little piece upon this subject from the French poet Béranger, using a version which appears in the Minor Morals of Dr Bowring :—

' One glass of water, Christian true !
To him that's weary—gracious Heaven
Reward thee—I'm the Wandering Jew,
By the eternal whirlwind driven ;

By years not worn, but sore oppress,
 And longing for the judgment-day,
 Praying for rest, to find no rest,
 Cursing each morn's returning ray.

Ever, ever,
 Earth revolves, I rest me never—
 Ever wandering—ever, ever.

And eighteen centuries now have sped
 On the dark wrecks of Rome and Greece ;
 I have seen the ashes scattered
 Of thousand shifting dynasties :
 Seen good, unfruitful good, and ill
 Prolific, while the tempest rolled ;
 Seen two new worlds the circle fill
 Which one world occupied of old.

Ever, ever,
 Earth revolves—I rest me never.

The ceaseless change is Heaven's decree—
 On dying things I fix my heart,
 And scarce I love them ardently
 Ere the wild whirlwind cries : “ Depart ! ”
 The poor man asks relief—my hand
 Is stretched the debt of love to pay—
 But ere sweet Charity's demand
 Is granted, I am whirled away—
 Ever, ever.

On the soft grass, in flow'rets drest,
 Near the fresh stream beneath the tree,
 If from my misery I would rest,
 The whirlwind howls and summons me.
 O why should angry Heaven deny
 One moment—one of sweet repose ?
 For were the grave eternity,
 It would not rest me from my woes—
 Ever, ever.

Those laughing girls, those sporting boys,
 Remind me of mine own at play ;
 My heart would revel in their joys—
 The whirlwind hurries me away.
 Ye old, who die, O envy not My miserable fate forlorn ;
 For I must tread upon the spot
 Where yet shall sleep the child unborn—
 Ever, ever.

I seek the venerable walls
 Which in my early youth I knew—
 I stop—the eternal whirlwind calls, Tyrannic : “ Onwards, onwards, Jew !

Onwards! Exist while all around
 Is perishing; in this thy home—
 Where all thy forefathers have found
 A tomb—for thee there is no tomb;"
 Ever, ever.

A cruel smile of scorn and hate
 I at the godlike Jesus threw.
 The earth is shaking 'neath my feet,
 The whirlwind drives me on—adieu!
 Ye pitiless, O tremble when Ye think of me—the wretched me!
 God in my fate avenges men,
 But not his own divinity—
 Ever, ever
 Earth revolves, I rest me never—

REMARKABLE CONDUCT OF A LITTLE GIRL.

THE following extraordinary act was performed by a child in Lyon not long ago, according to a continental paper.

An unfortunate artisan, the father of a family, was deprived of work by the depressed state of his trade during a whole winter. It was with great difficulty that he could get a morsel of food now and then for his famished wife and children. Things grew worse and worse with him, and at length, on attempting to rise one morning, for the purpose of going out, as usual, in quest of employment, he fell back in a fainting condition, beside his wife, who had already been confined to her bed by illness for two months. The poor man felt himself ill, and his strength utterly gone. He had two boys, yet in mere childhood, and one girl, about twelve or thirteen years old. For a long time, the whole charge of the household had fallen on this girl. She had tended the sick-bed of her mother, and had watched over her little brothers with more than parental care. Now, when the father too was taken ill, there seemed to be not a vestige of hope for the family, excepting in the exertions which might be made by her, young as she was.

The first thought of the poor little girl was to seek for work proportioned to her strength. But that the family might not starve in the meantime, she resolved to go to one of the Houses of Charity, where food was given out, she had heard, to the poor and needy. The person to whom she addressed herself accordingly inscribed her name in the list of applicants, and told her to come back again in a day or two, when the case would have been deliberated upon. Alas, during this deliberation, her parents and brothers would starve! The girl stated this, but was informed that the formalities mentioned were indispensable. She came again to the streets, and, almost agonised by the knowledge how anxiously she was expected, with bread, at home, she resolved to ask charity from the passengers in the public ways.

No one heeded the modest, unobtrusive appeal of her outstretched hand. Her heart was too full to permit her to speak. Could any one have seen the torturing anxiety that filled her breast, she must have been pitied and relieved. As the case stood, it is not perhaps surprising that some rude being menaced her with the police. She was frightened. Shivering with cold, and crying bitterly, she fled homewards. When she mounted the stairs and opened the door, the first words that she heard were the cries of her brothers for something to eat — ‘Bread! bread!’ She saw her father soothing and supporting her fainting mother, and heard him say: ‘Bread!—she dies for want of food.’

The cry of disappointment and despair which came at these words from her father and brothers, caused her to recall what she had said, and conceal the truth. ‘I have not got it yet,’ she exclaimed, ‘but I will have it immediately. I have given the baker the money;

he was serving some rich people, and he told me to wait or come back. I came to tell you that it would soon be here.'

After these words, without waiting for a reply, she left the house again. A thought had entered her head, and maddened by the distress of those she loved so dearly, she had instantaneously resolved to put it in execution. She ran from one street to another, till she saw a baker's shop in which there appeared to be no person, and then, summoning all her determination, she entered, lifted a loaf, and fled! The shopkeeper saw her from behind his counter. He cried loudly, ran after her, and pointed her out to the people passing by. The girl ran on. She was pursued, and finally a man seized the loaf which she carried. The object of her desires taken away, she had no motive to proceed, and was seized at once. They conveyed her towards the office of the police; a crowd, as usual, having gathered in attendance. The poor girl threw around her despairing glances, which seemed to seek some favourable object from whom to ask mercy. At last, when she had been brought to the court of the police-office, and was in waiting for the order to enter, she saw before her a little girl of her own age, who appeared to look on her with a glance full of kindness and compassion. Under the impulse of the moment, still thinking of the condition of her family, she whispered to the stranger the cause of her act of theft.

'Father and mother, and my two brothers, are dying for want of bread!' said she.

'Where?' asked the strange girl anxiously.

'Rue —, No. 10' —. She had only time to add the name of her parents to this communication, when she was carried in before the commissary of police.

Meanwhile, the poor family at home suffered all the miseries of suspense. Fears for their child's safety were added to the other afflictions of the parents. At length, they heard footsteps ascending the stair. An eager cry of hope was uttered by all the four unfortunates, but, alas! a stranger appeared in place of their own little one. Yet the stranger seemed to them like an angel. Her cheeks had a beautiful bloom, and long flaxen hair fell in curls upon her shoulders. She brought to them bread, and a small basket of other provisions. ‘Your girl,’ she said, ‘will not come back perhaps to-day; but keep up your spirits! See what she has sent you!’ After these encouraging words, the young messenger of good put into the hands of the father five francs, and then, turning round to cast a look of pity and satisfaction on the poor family, who were dumb with emotion, she disappeared.

The history of these five francs is the most remarkable part of this affair. This little benevolent fairy was, it is almost unnecessary to say, the same pitying spectator who had been addressed by the abstractor of the loaf at the police-office. As soon as she had heard what was said there, she had gone away, resolved to take some meat to the poor family. But she remembered that her mamma was from home that day, and was at a loss how to procure money or food, until she bethought herself of a resource of a strange kind. She recollects that a hairdresser, who lived near her mother’s house, and who knew her family, had often commended her beautiful hair, and had told her to come to him whenever she wished to have it cut, and he would give her a louis for it. This used to make her proud and pleased, but she now thought of it in a different way. In order to procure money for the assistance of the starving family, she went straight to the hairdresser’s, put him in mind of his promise, and offered to let him cut off all her pretty locks for what he thought them worth.

Naturally surprised by such an application, the hairdresser, who was a kind and intelligent man, made inquiry into the cause of his young friend’s visit. Her secret was easily drawn from her, and it caused the hairdresser almost to shed tears of pleasure. He feigned to comply with the conditions proposed, and gave the bargainer fifteen francs, promising to come and claim his purchase at some future day. The little girl then got a basket, bought provisions, and set out on her errand of mercy. Before she returned, the hairdresser had gone to her mother's, found that lady come home, and related to her the whole circumstances ; so that, when the possessor of the golden tresses came back, she was gratified by being received into the open arms of her pleased and praising parent.

When the story was told at the police-office by the hairdresser, the abstraction of the loaf was visited by no severe punishment. The singular circumstances connected with the case, raised many friends to the artisan and his family, and he was soon restored to health and comfort.

IDLE and extravagant as some of our funeral customs continue to be, they bear no comparison with what prevailed some sixty or eighty years ago ; even within the last thirty years, a very great improvement has taken place in this branch of our domestic economy. The most remarkable thing about the old Scotch funeral customs, was the high degree of jovialty which prevailed. The interval of a few days which elapsed between the death and burial of an individual, was little else than a period of continual feasting, and the house bore more resemblance to a tavern in the height of business, than to a dwelling of sorrow and lamentation.

We are old enough to remember some of these remarkable ongoingings, and their gradual subsidence into comparative decency and sobriety. First in the series of entertainments, came the ' dressing of the corpse,' which was attended by all the female acquaintances of the family.

and also some of the more intimate male friends at a later period of the evening. In every town there was at least one old lady who followed the profession of making cerements, and she, of course, on occasions of this nature, figured as mistress of the ceremonies. The body of the defunct, under her directions, was now seen laid out in a sort of state, with the pure white habiliments spreading in all their amplitude around the sides of the bed, and hanging from the top in tastefully disposed festoons.

Next in the order of ceremonies was the ‘ chesting,’ or laying of the body of the deceased in the coffin ; and this generally took place, in the midst of a great number of friends, on the evening previous to the day appointed for the funeral. The chesting, being an assemblage rather more of a private than of a public nature, was immediately followed by the ‘ latewake ;’ a lengthy entertainment, or series of entertainments, at which perhaps some hundreds of persons attended by invitation. The latewake was in fact a regular carousal, lasting the greater part of the night. Inasmuch as some prim old female fashioner had superintended the ceremony of laying out the corpse, so now the undertaker, who was some douce old carpenter, reputed for his skill in coffin-making and grace-saying, acted as master of the revels. If the number of the acquaintances of the family was considerable, the duties of this most respectable functionary were by no means trifling. In order to serve all equally, so many guests were invited at one hour, and so many at another, by which there was a fresh company every hour, and to each the same attentions were shewn. Yet it rarely happened that the whole of each company was cleared out ; there was always a remnant, composed of a few ‘ drouthy neighbours,’ who felt themselves particularly comfortable both in respect of drink and conversation, so that a leavening of the same individuals may be said to have been kept up from first to last through the entire latewake. Now, to meet such contingencies as these, and keeping in view that each new service required a new benediction, it was of importance that the undertaker should be a man possessed of a considerable number of graces : the same over and over again would have been intolerable to the remnant of drouthy neebours aforesaid. Well do we remember old Laird Grieve, a worthy famous alike for his coffins, his jests, and his latewake graces ; and we daresay many of our readers whose remembrance carries them back to the period to which we refer, must have similar recollections of the class of undertakers of which the laird was a sample.

At these latewakes, which were universal through the country, an immense deal of viands was consumed. The staple articles of entertainment were generally whisky, beer, cheese, bread, and tobacco — producing oceans of punch, mountains of bread and cheese, and clouds of smoke. To shew to what wasteful extravagance these carousals were sometimes carried, we need only mention, that, at the latewake and other funeral entertainments of the great-grandfather of the present writer—a person moving in a respectable but comparatively humble rank of life, who died between seventy and ninety years since—sixteen stones of cheese and a stone of tobacco, with a number of gallons of whisky and beer, were consumed. A game, of which we do not know the exact nature, but which was called Dishyloof, was played, and the feast continued for upwards of two days. On other occasions, we have heard, the young people of both sexes would engage in games of forfeits, which raised the merry-making to a pitch still more removed from the decorum which seems to a rational mind proper to the occasion. Sometimes the house would be so full, that parties were fain to sit on the front of the very bed containing the corpse.

The following strange story connected with a latewake was related in the Scots Magazine, a few years before it terminated :—‘ Mr William Craighead, author of a popular system of arithmetic, was parish schoolmaster of Monifieth, situate upon the estuary of the Tay, about six miles east from Dundee. then a young man, fond of a frolic, without being very scrupulous about the means, or calculating the consequences. There was a latewake in the neighbourhood, attended by a number of his acquaintance, according to the custom of the times ; Craighead procured a confederate, with whom he concerted a plan to draw the watchers from the house, or at least from the room where the corpse lay. Having succeeded in this, he dexterously removed the dead body to an outer-house, while his companion occupied the place of the corpse in the bed where it had lain. It was agreed upon between the confederates, that when the company was reassembled, Craighead was to join them, and at a concerted signal the impostor was to rise shrouded like the dead man, while the two were to enjoy the terror and alarm of their companions. Mr Craighead came in, and after being some time seated, the signal was made, but met no attention—he was rather surprised : it was repeated, and still neglected. Mr Craighead in his turn now became alarmed, for he conceived it impossible that his companion could have fallen asleep in that situation—his uneasiness became insupportable—he went to the bed—and found his companion lifeless ! Mr Craighead's feelings, as may well be imagined, now entirely overpowered him, and the dreadful fact was disclosed. Their agitation was extreme, and it was far from being alleviated when every attempt to restore animation to the thoughtless young man proved abortive. As soon as their confusion would permit, an inquiry was made after the original corpse : Mr Craighead and another went to fetch it, but—it was not to be found ! The alarm and consternation of the company was now redoubled ; that of Mr Craighead was little short of distraction. Daylight came without relieving their agitation ; no trace of the corpse could be discovered, and Mr Craighead was accused as the primum mobile of all that had happened. He was incapable of sleeping, and wandered several days and nights in search of the body, which was at last discovered in the parish of Tealing, deposited in a field about six miles distant from the place from whence it was removed. It is related, that this extraordinary affair had a strong and lasting effect upon Mr Craighead's mind and conduct; that he immediately became serious and thoughtful, and ever after conducted himself with great prudence and sobriety.'

After all, the latewake did not conclude the entertainments by which our ancestors thought it proper to signalise the deaths of their friends. There was still the entertainment at the funeral itself, which, at the very least, usually consisted of several rounds of cake and wine or whisky, and was sometimes protracted till the company had become not very fit to move decorously to the burial-place. The case alluded to in Humphry Clinker, of a company who were so far confused by their potations as to go half-way to the church-yard before discovering that they had left the corpse behind, was, we have heard, a real one. The circumstance occurred at the funeral of Mrs Hume of Billy, in Berwickshire; an unfortunate lady who, about a century ago, was murdered by her man-servant. To this day, in the Highlands of Scotland, the entertainments at funerals are of an elaborate character. The attendants, usually coming from great distances, actually require more refreshment than those who attend funerals in town; and this necessity easily leads to over-indulgence. Whisky is always distributed in abundance, with bread, cheese, and perhaps still more substantial viands; and it is not to be wondered at that, finding such provisions before them after a long walk or ride, the generality of those present manifest some disposition to delay the march to the church-yard. It may give some idea of the complicated nature of a Highland funeral, that when an Argyleshire gentlewoman of fortune died sixteen or seventeen years ago in Edinburgh, and was carried to her native parish for interment, the entire bill of the man of legal business who managed the affair, amounted to L.450!

The funeral being finished, and the deceased quietly or inquietly inurned, there was still something more to be done. The company had to return to the dredgy; an entertainment somewhat similar to the latewake, and probably taking its rise in some ceremony of ancient days, in which dirges were sung, as no other feasible explanation of the name can be given. The dredgy being concluded, the poor family was at length left to feel for the first time, in solitude and leisure, the severity of the loss with which they had been visited, and to seek for the appropriate consolations.

THE GREAT STIRLING CASE.

ABOUT the year 1825, a respectable-looking elderly gentleman made his appearance in Edinburgh, where his habits and pretensions created some degree of curiosity. He lived generally in lodgings, genteel, but not aristocratic. He seemed to be a man of very moderate income, and did not mix in high society, yet he called himself Earl of Stirling. This title was an old and respected one in Scotland, and its assumption did not create much surprise ; for poor gentlemen with contested claims to ancient titles of nobility, are not very uncommon in the Scottish metropolis. With regard to the person describing himself as Earl of Stirling, some spoke doubtfully of his pretensions, others treated him as an impostor. What he really was, will appear, after giving certain preliminary explanations.

Sir William Alexander of Menstrie, a poet and statesman of the reign of King James I. of England, had entered into that sovereign's project for colonising the borders of the Gulf of St Lawrence. He was gifted by charter with a large territory, nearly identical with the same which is still called Nova Scotia, but containing a considerable portion of Canada; and he and his heirs were appointed hereditary lords-lieutenant of the district, with something very like sovereign powers. A territory without people on it is, however, of little value either to sovereign or proprietor. To induce British subjects, especially Scotsmen of rank, to take land in the district, the new dignity of Baronets of Nova Scotia was created. It was to be conferred on acceptable persons, who paid for and received a grant of 16,000 acres of land in the colony.

The Earl of Stirling's son becoming involved in difficulties, sold his American privilege to a French colonist; and by the treaty of St Germain in 1632, these North American British colonies were all ceded to France. At the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, they became again a British possession, but on a new foundation, as if they had never belonged to Britain before. Perhaps the government might have restored any family claims of a reasonable kind that could have been shewn to be lost by the French conquest, but the Alexanders, as we have seen, had disposed of their right. Though some persons were from time to time spoken of as representatives of the distinguished family, no one made a serious attempt to resume the title and its privileges, until the present century, when the individual above mentioned, laid his plans in the remarkable manner which we are now going to describe.

The name of the gentleman in question was Alexander Humphrys or Humphreys. His first step was, in 1824, to obtain a royal licence to assume the name of Alexander. He stated in his application, that he had a maternal grandfather of that name, and he wished to assume it, 'as well out of grateful respect to his memory, as out of respect for the wishes oftentimes expressed by his deceased mother.' It is believed that any person may obtain a licence of this sort who states any such plausible reason, and pays the necessary fees. It could have no effect in a legal point of view. But the expression 'royal licence' has a great influence on common minds—a secret known very well to second-rate inventors, who always announce their

His next step was to shew his descent from the old Stirling family, and get it in some way judicially certified. The connection he tried to establish was this: his father, William Humphreys of Birmingham, had married Hannah Alexander, granddaughter of the Rev. John Alexander. This reverend John was the son of another John Alexander, of Donaghadee, in Ireland; and he was said to be a son of the Honourable John Alexander, fourth son of the Earl of Stirling. There had long existed in Scotland certain formalities, by which a person could obtain a public and judicial certificate of his pedigree, or his connection with the succession to certain property. Without entering into any technical particulars, it may be sufficient to say, that until certain improved practices were established, these ‘services,’ as they are called, used to be carried through as mere matters of routine. A narrative was made out, and some documents read; and then the persons assembled, taking for granted that everything was regular, certified their belief in it. If the whole be a tissue of lies and forgeries, which is sometimes possible, it has generally to be examined afterwards, as in the present case, when there is an attempt made to obtain any property or other advantage, and the attempt is resisted. The reader will perhaps remember that in the novel of Guy Mannering, when young Bertram is discovered, a process of this kind is adopted by Pleydell, as the first step for asserting the young heir’s right. Colonel Mannering says: ‘Well, have you carried through your law-business?’

‘With a wet finger,’ answered the lawyer; ‘got our youngster’s special service returned into Chancery. We had him served heir before the macers.’

‘Macers! who are they?’

‘Why, it is a kind of judicial saturnalia. You must know, that one of the requisites to be a macer, or officer in attendance upon our supreme court, is, that they shall be men of no knowledge.’

‘Very well.’

'Now, our Scottish legislature—for the joke's sake, I suppose—have constituted these men of no knowledge into a peculiar court for trying questions of relationship and descent, such as this business of Bertram, which often involve the most nice and complicated questions of evidence.'

The ease of getting through with such ceremonies will account for the circumstance, that before any steps were taken against him, Mr Humphreys had, undisturbed, possessed himself of the documents thus certifying his pretensions. He first certified in this way his descent from the Irish Alexanders. He next certified his descent through them from the first Earl of Stirling. He made himself out to be heir to the property and honours of that nobleman by further proceedings; which not only certified that he was descended from him, but that other and nearer branches of the family had all become extinguished. It was appointed in the original charter of Nova Scotia, that Sir William Alexander and his descendants were to go through the mere formal process of investment by a ceremony in Edinburgh Castle, and this ceremony was gone through.

Still, there was besides the circumstance that the American estates had been disposed of, another serious difficulty to be overcome. The earldom and the estates were both united to heirs-male, and Mr Humphreys represented a female descendant. To get over this, a document was produced, which purported to be a copy of a charter granted by Charles I. in 1639, which renewed the grants to the Earl of Stirling, and widened their character, so that they embraced heirs-female as well as male. We shall see in the end into what a position this document plunged Mr Humphreys and his claim.

Mr Humphreys now gradually assumed the title of Earl of Stirling, spoke of his mother as the late countess, and gave his other immediate relations the usual term of 'Honourable' So and So. In an election of a Scottish representative peer, which took place on the 2d of June 1825, the first person who appears on the roll of voters is

'the Earl of Stirling ;' and it is stated in the minutes of election — the business being conducted by Sir Walter Scott, as principal clerk of Session — 'upon the title of Earl of Stirling being called, Alexander Humphreys Alexander claimed to vote as Earl of Stirling, as being heir-male of the body of Hannah, Countess of Stirling, who was lineally descended from William, first Earl of Stirling, and who died on the 20th day of September 1814, and thereby under the destination of a royal charter, or letters-patent of Novodamus under the great seal of Scotland, dated 2d December 1639, granted by His Majesty King Charles I., &c.; and his vote was received by the clerks.' Here, again, Mr Humphreys appears to have had the advantage of taking people by surprise. The narrative was well put together ; it looked feasible even to a person so well acquainted with history and genealogy as Sir Walter Scott ; and as there was no other peer who could take it on him to say, that the whole statement was a hallucination or a fraud, the vote was taken. At another meeting for the election of peers in 1830, when the name of the Earl of Stirling was called, the Earl of Rosebery said he would not oppose the vote to be tendered, as it had been admitted at a previous election ; 'but, at the same time, he was desirous of expressing an opinion, that it would be far more consistent with regularity and propriety were those individuals who conceived they were entitled to dormant peerages, to make good their claims to them before the House of Lords, previous to taking the titles and exercising the privileges attached to them.' Nothing could shew better how cautiously and effectively Humphreys or his advisers had conducted their project, than this extremely mild protest against a man who had no more right to vote at the elections than the porter of the room where they were held.

But the so-called earl obtained still more substantial acknowledgments of success than these mere titles. He was extremely poor at the beginning of his career. Traces were found of his having had to move abruptly from place to place, to avoid his creditors, and using all the shifts and evasions which needy men learn the art of exercising. He required large funds, however, to carry on his operations; and he made his claims appear so plausible to the money-lenders, that they advanced to him L.13,000.

It must be remembered by those who may feel astonished at the success with which these proceedings were conducted to a certain extent, that the Canada possessions made the earldom of Stirling almost the only peerage on which a sheer impostor could have much temptation to make an attack. In general, the property belonging to the other peerages which have lain dormant has gone into other hands, and been rendered irrecoverable: still, cases of claim to both title and property are not uncommon; in some instances the right to property being dependent on the vindication of a right to title. In whichever way it is, the claimant has usually to go through a litigation with some other person, who urges a preferable claim. The peculiar temptation to aim at the Stirling peerage, was the right it conveyed over the vast territory in America. This had not been, like the British estates of the other dormant peers, in the hands of purchasers or other persons, who had an indisputable claim to possess them. The greater portion of the territory was still unappropriated, and was in the hands of the crown, to be disposed of to emigrants. If a claim preferable to that of the crown could be made out in favour of Humphreys, he would derive a great revenue by disposing of allotments to emigrants. Accordingly, after having obtained the documents already alluded to, and accustomed people for some years to consider him as Lord Stirling, he proceeded to act on the American property. His first step was one of princely gratitude. A Mr Christopher Banks had been his chief agent in all his operations. He had especially found for him the documents on which he raised his claim to represent the Alexander family. On the 14th of July 1831, 'the Earl Stirling,' made a gift to Banks of 16,000 acres of land in Canada, and appointed him a baronet of Nova Scotia. Sir Christopher, like his patron, took the title and dignity. He required, however, to have some royal sanction to his elevation ; and he applied to the Lords of the Treasury to confirm the grant ; but he was not even favoured with an answer to his application, and in other proceedings which he adopted, he fared no better.

Now came out a heap of proclamations, and other documents, about the American possessions in a truly royal style. One of these, which was a prospectus for an allocation of grants of land on a large scale, began in this manner. It will be seen how ingeniously the earl makes use of the documents which we have already described.

‘The Earl of Stirling, hereditary lieutenant and lord-proprietor of the province of Nova Scotia, and the lordship of Canada, was, on the 2d day of July last, duly served nearest and lawful heir in special to his great-great-grandfather, Sir William Alexander, first Earl of Stirling, under the royal charters granted by their Majesties King James and Charles I., which were afterwards confirmed in parliament in 1633. This verdict of heirship was duly returned to the Chancery in Scotland; and in virtue thereof, by a precept from His Majesty, directed furth of his Chancery to the sheriff of the county of Edinburgh, his lordship was infest in the whole territory, with all its parts and pertinents, the offices of His Majesty’s hereditary lieutenant of Nova Scotia, &c. (New Brunswick and the adjacent islands included), by sasine taken at the Castle of Edinburgh, on the 8th day of the said month of July, in terms of the powers, extent of territory, &c. contained in the charters of his said ancestor.’

Now, as these statements, so far as they went, were literally true—for Humphreys really had obtained these documents—how could any one doubt that he was the person he announced himself as being ? The English courts of law had so little doubt of it, that they admitted his privilege of freedom from arrest. The colonial authorities were, according to the accounts of Mr Banks, who had been sent ambassador to America, preparing to act in conformity with his pretensions. To keep up to his character, when Lord Durham was appointed governor of the North American colonies, Humphreys issued a protest against the terms of the appointment, as an infringement of his privileges. It is a curious circumstance, that this was published only in the French newspapers. In the British press, however, a skilful series of articles kept up the delusion. It was aided from time to time by judicious paragraphs. For instance, there appeared, as quoted from the Stirling Journal, an account of the arrival of the earl to visit the seat of his ancestors. ‘The circumstance of his lordship’s arrival was no sooner known to the magistrates, than the bells were set a-ring ; and about eleven o’clock to-day, they waited on his lordship, to congratulate him on his visit to the residence of his noble ancestors.’

Meanwhile, the crown-lawyers, who had been watching these proceedings, thought it was high time that an end should be put to the farce, especially as the so-called earl was taking some legal steps of such a nature that, if he were successful, it would be very difficult to counteract. For instance, it was of great moment that he should establish the validity of the charter which he said was granted in the form of a renewal in 1639 : it was on this that he rested not only the restoration of the American grants to the Earls of Stirling, but also his own claim through a female representative. We shall see afterwards what kind of document this was. In the meantime, the crown, not content with opposing his attempts to prove its authenticity, became the assailant, and commenced proceedings for pulling down his whole fabric.

Of the several questions, one of course was, whether the pedigree by which he attached his grandfather, the Rev. John Alexander, to the Stirling family, was accurate. On this subject, there were produced two affidavits of the early part of the eighteenth century. One of them was of a vague character, but the other was extremely distinct. It bore that the person who made it was ‘intimately acquainted with the rev. minister, John Alexander, grandson and only male representative of John Alexander of Gartmore, the fourth son of William, first Earl of Stirling in Scotland, which said John Alexander was formerly of Antrim.' The affidavit not only completed the pedigree, but it contained an account of the charter of 1639, the terms of which the claimant was so anxious to prove, if he could not get possession of the original. This affidavit bore the signature, admitted to be genuine, of Baron Pocklington, of the Irish Exchequer ; but there was something suspicious about its suiting so precisely with the claimant's case, and it had a curious appearance. It was submitted to two eminent chemists, who stated that the paper above the signature had previously been some other writing, which must have been chemically removed, the affidavit having been written in its place. At the same time, there was produced a copy of an inscription on a tombstone, professing to have been raised over the remains of John Alexander of Antrim, who died in 1712. It stated, precisely in the same manner as the affidavit, the descent from the Stirling family. It contained, indeed, so precisely what Humphreys wanted to make out his claim, that the judge could not help remarking, that it was very strong in his favour—'as strong as if it had been composed for this very case.' But there were fatal defects in the evidence adduced in favour of its accuracy as a copy of the original inscription, and the tombstone itself had long disappeared. In fact, it was not proved that such a tombstone had ever existed ; and unless the claimant could get over this defect, the inscription was of no use to him. How it was attempted to be got over, we shall presently see.

But while the crown thus removed the foundation from the claimant's case, they distinctly proved something that told strongly against it. It was shewn that John Alexander, the fourth son of the Earl of Stirling, from whom Humphreys claimed his descent, had by his wife, the heiress of Gartmore, only a daughter. The person whom Humphreys claimed as his great-great-grandfather, John Alexander, therefore, could not be his son, unless he had married again.

Thus, it was necessary for carrying out his claim that, besides some minor points on which it is unnecessary to enter, Mr Humphreys should prove three things, which were as yet destitute of support: 1st, The terms of the charter of 1639, on which so much depended; 2<sup>d</sup>, The existence of the tombstone and its inscription; and 3<sup>d</sup>, That the fourth son of the Earl of Stirling had married a second wife, who bore him a son. The marvellous manner in which evidence of these important matters arose just as it was wanted, is the most romantic part of the whole case. A son of Mr Humphreys, or of the earl, as he was termed, calling one day at the shop of De Porquet and Co., booksellers of London, who had published for his father a book in defence of his claims, was told that there was a packet there for 'the Right Hon. the Earl of Stirling.' It had been enclosed in a parcel addressed to the firm, and containing along with it a note in the handwriting, apparently, of a lady. It bore to be from a 'Mrs Innes Smyth,' a person of whose existence none of the parties professed to know anything. It stated, that she had intended to call with the enclosure, but found it expedient to send it by post; and terminated with a particular request, that the publishers 'will forward it instantly to the Earl of Stirling, or any member of his lordship's family whose residence may be known to them.'

The precaution was taken of opening this packet in the presence of unquestionable witnesses. It disclosed an inner packet with a parchment cover, and sealed with three old-fashioned seals. This bore the inscription, 'some of my wife's family papers,' in a handwriting said to be that of the claimant's father. Along with this inner parcel was another note. It contained a statement, that the parcel was found in a cash-box which had been stolen from 'the late William Humphreys, Esq.' The thief, it said, had just died; and in continuation it was said, that 'his family being now certain that the son of Mr Humphreys is the Lord Stirling who has lately published a narrative of his case, they have requested a lady going to London to leave the packet at his lordship's publishers—

a channel of conveyance pointed out by the book itself, and which they hope is quite safe. His lordship will perceive that the seals have never been broken. The family of the deceased must, for obvious reasons, remain unknown. They make this reparation, but cannot be expected to court disgrace and infamy.'

This useful packet contained evidence to fill up the greater part of the blanks in the previous proof; among other things, a genealogical tree, giving an account of the second marriage which had been wanted for John Alexander of Gartmore. His second wife was Elizabeth Maxwell of Londonderry, and by her he had a son, John, 'sixth Earl of Stirling.' Along with this, there were several letters, which very neatly supplied deficiencies in some of the affidavits previously produced.

But there were some documents still required to make the deficient evidence complete, and we shall now see how they came to light. Mr Humphreys had an acquaintance in France—a Mademoiselle Le Normand, whose position it is difficult for people of this country fully to understand. She was a kind of fortune-teller, and united to this profession a wonderful facility in discovering a solution of any important mystery, and especially in finding lost papers. Notwithstanding such questionable occupations, she appears to have held a considerable social position in her own country. She was a literary woman, and had a very extensive correspondence with authors and men in office. She was about seventy years old at the time of these proceedings. It appears that she had an early intimacy with Mrs Humphreys, or 'the countess,' and predicted that, after a time of trial, she would rise to greatness. The account which Mr Humphreys gave of her when examined by the court was this: 'Interrogated, what is Mademoiselle Le Normand's profession? Declares, that he has the highest respect for Mademoiselle Le Normand, but has nothing to say as to her peculiar talents: that she is auteur libraire, and publishes and sells her own works. Interrogated, if he does not know whether she has any other occupation or employment? Declares, that he can only say, that she has been consulted by persons of the highest rank—sovereigns and others. He has nothing to do with her in any other way than he has explained. And reinterrogated, and desired to answer the question. He can only answer that on her door is inscribed Bureau de Correspondence. More than this he cannot say: that she is consulted by all sorts of persons. Interrogated, if she is not generally known in Paris as a fortune-teller, and consulted as such? Declares, that in the common acceptation, he believes that she is so considered. Believes she tells fortunes by means of cards. Specially interrogated, if he has seen her tell fortunes by means of cards? Declares, that being advised by his counsel to answer the question, he says that he has seen her do so. Believes that she is paid by those who consult her to tell their fortunes. Interrogated, did she tell him his own fortune on the cards or otherwise? Declares, she certainly did at one period—as thousands have had the same curiosity—that he then paid her five Napoleons; that this was a long time ago.'

He explained, that he had kept up a correspondence with this lady about his claims, because her varied correspondence and intimacy with literary and official people might enable her to procure documents about the American possessions of the Stirling family, during the French possession of North America. Mademoiselle had so much faith either in her fortune-telling, or in her capacity to find documents, that she advanced a considerable sum to Humphreys, to enable him to carry on his litigations —certainly, a very unusual act for a fortune-teller.

In considerable dejection after the signal breaking down of his case in the Court of Session, Mr Humphreys was travelling abroad. He admitted that he travelled under a feigned name, but would not reveal it. Naturally, he called on his old friend the fortune-teller, and from her he received, to his astonishment, a mysterious packet, just as his son had from the London publishers. Like the London packet, it had been anonymously deposited, all trace of the party who had communicated it being cut off. In fact, it was found one day dropped in mademoiselle's chamber, after two ladies of high rank, on a professional visit to the seeress, had departed. The packet was accompanied by a letter, dated from Versailles, and signed only with the initial letter M. It stated, that the writer was aware of the lively interest which mademoiselle took in the success of the Englishman Alexander, in his claims to possess the inheritance of his ancestors ; that he was under deep obligations to her, which he endeavoured in some measure to repay by the documents which he enclosed. He intimated, that being in office, he could not come personally forward in the affair, or permit his name to be known. When Humphreys was questioned, if he knew who this individual could be, he said he did not know, but had his suspicions, and they pointed to a personage so august and lofty, that he dared not name him.

The package contained a large old French map of Canada, covered over with other documents, which supplied all that was wanted for completing the evidence of the claim to the earldom and estates. Here was full evidence to confirm the copy of the charter of the year 1639, which had already been produced, but which required confirmation. There was a copy of the inscription on the tombstone already mentioned, accurately authenticated ; and there were several other writings confirming the genealogical statements.

It seemed now necessary to put a stop, in an effectual manner, to a system of such audacious fraud. On the 29th of April 1839, Humphreys was brought to trial for forgery. The case involved a very protracted and complicated investigation, and it lasted for four days. It was soon very evident, that of the actual forgery there could be no doubt—the counsel for Humphreys gave up the point. The question was, whether he was guilty, either of having himself committed the forgeries, or of having used the documents in the knowledge that they were forged by others.

The numerous documents which were the subject of the trial, may be divided into three main groups: the documents left with the London booksellers; the contents of the packet left with Mademoiselle Le Normand; and the charter of 1639, restoring the Canada estates to the Stirling family, and opening the succession to female heirs. The first set of documents is not much worthy of attention. The map, and other documents deposited with the French seeress were, however, extremely curious, and one can now see a fac-simile of the whole in one of the reports of the trial.* Of the inscriptions on the map, some were signed apparently by persons who might have occupied unimportant offices in France, and of whom all traces might be supposed to be lost. But their statements were supported by the testimony of very great men indeed—such as Esprit Fléchier, Bishop of Nismes; the illustrious Fénélon; and Louis XIV. The strange circumstance was, that all these people seemed to take an intense interest in the charter conferred on the Earl of Stirling, and the pedigree of the family, certifying in the most minute manner every little fact connected with them, as if it were a French affair of state, or something in which they had a personal interest. Thus one of the unknown certifiers, named St Etienne, speaking of the charter, and a note of its contents, says: ‘The above note is precious. I can certify that it gives, in a few words, an extremely correct idea of the wonderful charter in question.’ He goes on to say, that ‘this extraordinary document extends over fifty pages in writing,’ and is very minute in his description of it. Then Bishop Fléchier says: ‘I read lately, at the house of Monsieur Sartre, at Caveirac, the copy of the Earl of Stirling’s charter. In it I remarked many curious particulars, mixed up with a great many uninteresting details. I think, therefore, that the greatest obligations are due to M. Mallet for having, by the above note, enabled the French public to judge of the extent and importance of the grants made to this Scottish nobleman. I also find that he has extracted the most essential clauses of the charter, and in translating them into French, he has given them with great fidelity.' Fénélon was equally earnest. The idea of two great French prelates occupying themselves in comparing and certifying copies of a Scottish law-paper of fifty pages was truly ridiculous.

At the trial, some French antiquaries, skilled in old writings, were examined about these papers. They at once pronounced them to be forgeries; said they were made with a mixture generally employed in France for imitating old writings; and seemed to treat the whole matter very lightly. The most conclusive evidence, however, was this: the map was made by De Lisle, the celebrated French geographer. It bore the date 1703. This might appear to be the date when it was published; but there were various things engraved on the map, which could not have been there earlier than 1715, and others which shewed a still later date. It will be sufficient to mention one of these. De Lisle is on the map called 'first geographer to the king.' It was proved by documents from the proper office in France, that he did not obtain this title until the year 1718. It appeared, indeed, that the date of the first publication was kept on the map, to mark the beginning of the copyright, but that this particular map could not have been printed off until after the year 1717; not only many years after the date given to the inscriptions on it, but some years after Louis XIV., Fénélon, and Fléchier, whose signatures were attached, had died.

The evidence about the charter was, if possible, more conclusive. Such documents are, in Scotland, always recorded in a public register. There was a good reason, however, why the Earl of Stirling's charter, of the year 1639, was not recorded, for a portion of the record, including the year 1639, had been long known to be lost. It would, of course, be very unjust, that Mr Humphreys should lose his rights because the record was lost; and it was but fair that he should be at liberty to establish the substance of the charter from other sources. His advisers, however, not being entirely acquainted with Scottish law proceedings, were not aware that a royal charter had to pass through several offices, in each of which, if it were not fully recorded, an account of it was kept. There was no account of any such charter in favour of the Earl of Stirling to be found in any of these offices. Further, although the record for the year 1639 was lost, there was an index of its contents in existence, and that contained no mention of such a document. It was so long, too, that the whole blank made by the lost records would not contain it. It contained a reference to the volume of the records from which it professed to be extracted; but the keeper of the records said, that that was not an old form of reference, but one which he had himself introduced a few years ago, when binding the records up in volumes. It was shewn that Archbishop Spotswood, one of the alleged witnesses of the charter, was dead before its date. There were many other little inaccuracies proving the forgery, but these were sufficient.

The jury found that the documents were forged. By a majority, however, they found it not proved that Humphreys was guilty of the forgery, and thus he was, though very narrowly, acquitted. If he was really innocent, he must have been the victim of a most extraordinary system of complicated deceit. Of course, by this result of the trial, the whole of his claims at once fell to the ground.

What became of the so-called Earl of Stirling, on this signal failure of his pretensions, we never heard. The case at the time created a considerable sensation in Edinburgh; and the manner in which it was investigated and settled, will probably have a salutary effect in preventing the assumption of groundless claims to Scottish peerages.

D O G I A N A .

WHENEVER I feel a fit of low spirits approaching, my invariable resource is to call my dog, and invite him to a social ramble. There are few companions more agreeable than a dog. Friends may go out with you when they would rather stay at home ; their minds are perhaps occupied with their own affairs, and often the merest trifle will withdraw their attention from you at a moment when you most require their sympathy. This is not the case with the dog : his whole attention is given to his master ; he tracks his steps, watches his looks, and obeys his commands with docility and cheerfulness. Ingratitude cannot estrange him ; even neglect fails to chill his constant love.

Whenever I meet any of my literary compatriots with a bilious-looking face, carrying into the field the same thoughts which had filled his mind in the study, I cannot help saying to myself : ‘ What a pity he does not get a dog ! ’ There is more in this than people at first sight may imagine ; but when it is considered that the object of the student’s walk is generally to rub away the cobwebs which intense study has engendered in the brain, to change the current of the thoughts, to unbend the over-stretched mind, and to rest the wearied faculties, for all these purposes there is no companion like the dog ; and, for a similar reason to that given by the witty Frenchman for frequenting the society of a lady who had not two ideas in her head—namely, ‘ he went there to rest his mind.’ In like manner, I would recommend all who are suffering from petty cares and worrying trifles, to try the effect of a good brisk walk with their dog ; it will do more to dispel the clouds of ill-humour and vexation than could be effected by the eloquence of a Cicero. The incessant scampering to and fro of the happy creature—happy that it has got its master for a companion and observer of its pranks—its heedless chase after sparrows, pigeons, or any other feathered and winged animal which has alighted on the ground—its wild baying and barking when full drive after the objects of pursuit—and anon its returning with panting tongue, sparkling eyes, and merry wagging tail, to look up in your face and receive its reward in a word of kindness—all, all is exhilarating, and helps wonderfully to enliven the dulness of a solitary stroll.

When my friends smile, as they occasionally do, at my partiality for this faithful friend of man, I defend myself by quoting the great men of antiquity who shared in the same sentiments. Alexander the Great was so grieved at the death of a favourite dog, that, as a relief to his sorrow, he raised a city in his honour. No one need be ashamed of writing in praise of dogs, when even Solon himself has not disdained to commemorate the following instance of affection in a dog called Hircanus towards his master Lysimachus, king of Macedon. This prince being killed in a battle against Seleucus, king of Syria, his body was discovered in the field of battle by the plaintive cries of his dog, which was found lying beside it. On the obsequies of the king, Hircanus leaped on the funeral pile, and perished in the flames that consumed the body of his beloved master. When such authorities fail, I put my adversaries to silence by presenting them with a few passages from Washington Irving's delightful description of a visit to Abbotsford.

'After my return from Melrose Abbey,' says he, 'Scott proposed a ramble, to shew me something of the surrounding country. As we sallied forth, every dog in the establishment turned out to attend us. There was the old and well-known staghound, Maida, a noble animal, and a great favourite of Scott's; and Hamlet, the black greyhound, a mild, thoughtless youngster, which had not yet arrived at the years of discretion; and Finella, a beautiful setter, with soft silken hair, long pendent ears, and a mild eye, the parlour favourite. When in front of the house, we were joined by a superannuated greyhound, which came from the kitchen, wagging his tail, and was cheered by Scott as an old friend and comrade. In our walks, Scott would frequently pause in conversation, to notice his dogs, and speak to them, as if rational companions; and indeed there appears to be a vast deal of rationality in these faithful attendants on man, derived from their close intimacy with him. Maida deported himself with a gravity becoming his age and size, and seemed to consider himself called upon to preserve a great degree of dignity and decorum in our society. As he jogged along a little distance ahead of us, the young dogs would gambol about him, leap on his neck, worry at his ears, and endeavour to tease him into a gambol. The old dog would keep on for a long time, with imperturbable solemnity, now and then seeming to rebuke the wantonness of his young companions. At length, he would make a sudden turn, seize one of them, and tumble him in the dust; then, giving a glance at us, as much as to say: "You see, gentlemen, I can't help giving way to this nonsense," would resume his gravity, and jog on as before. Scott amused himself with these peculiarities. "I make no doubt," said he, "when Maida is alone with these young dogs, he throws gravity aside, and plays the boy as much as any of them; but he is ashamed to do so in our company, and seems to say: 'Ha' done with your nonsense, youngsters; what will the laird and that other gentleman think of me if I give way to such foolery?'"

'While we were discussing the humours and peculiarities of our canine companions, some object provoked their spleen, and produced a sharp and petulant barking from the smaller fry; but it was sometime before Maida was sufficiently roused to ramp forward two or three bounds, and join the chorus with a deep-mouthing bow-wow. It was but a transient outbreak, and he returned instantly, wagging his tail, and looking up dubiously in his master's face, uncertain whether he would receive censure or applause. "Ay, ay, old boy," cried Scott, "you have done wonders; you have shaken the Eildon Hills with your roaring; you may now lay by your artillery for the rest of the day. Maida," continued he, "is like the great gun at Constantinople; it takes so long to get it ready, that the smaller guns can fire off a dozen times first; but when it does go off, it does great mischief."

'These simple anecdotes may serve to shew the delightful play of Scott's humours and feelings in private life. His domestic animals were his friends. Everything about him seemed to rejoice in the light of his countenance; the face of the humblest dependent brightened at his approach, as if he anticipated a cordial and cheering word. There was no guest at dinner but myself. Around the table were two or three dogs in attendance. Maida, the old staghound, took his seat at Scott's elbow, looking up wistfully in his master's eye; while Finella, the pet spaniel, placed herself near Mrs Scott, by whom, I soon perceived, she was completely spoiled. The conversation happening to turn on the merits of his dogs, Scott spoke with great feeling and affection of his favourite terrier, Camp, which is depicted by his side in the earlier engravings of him. He talked of him as of a real friend whom he had lost; and Sophia Scott, looking up archly in his face, observed, that "papa shed a few tears when Camp died." I may here mention another testimonial of Scott's fondness for his dogs, and his humorous mode of shewing it, which I subsequently met with. Rambling with him one morning about the grounds adjacent to the house, I observed a small antique monument, on which was inscribed: "Here lies the brave Percy." I paused, supposing it to be the tomb of some stark warrior of the olden time, but Scott drew near. "Pooh!" cried he, "it is nothing but one of the monuments of my nonsense, of which you will find enough hereabout." I learned afterwards that it was the grave of a favourite greyhound.'

The following incident, for the authenticity of which I can fully vouch, is one proof amongst many that our best feelings, if not put under the control of sense and reason, may lead us into a thousand absurdities:—A gentleman called one day on a lady, accompanied by his dog, a fine bluff old fellow, with nothing of the courtier about him. After a little conversation, the lady asked her visitor if he would allow his dog to dine with her dogs, which were about to go to dinner. The gentleman, of course, made no objection, and accordingly a footman was summoned to carry the newly-invited guest to be introduced to the lady's dogs. For a time all seemed to be peace and harmony, when suddenly a tremendous uproar was heard in the dogs' dining-hall, and, in the midst of a chorus of bow-wows, the voice of the gentleman's dog rose above the whole. In great alarm, the lady hastily rang the bell. 'John, what is the matter there?' 'Oh, nothing, my lady; only the stranger dog don't like to have his mouth wiped after dinner.'

Dogs are not epicures by nature, but many have this vice ingrafted on them by injudicious kindness. I knew a spaniel so completely spoiled in this respect, that he would not eat his strawberries unless they were dipped in cream and sugar, and he would turn up his nose at a plate of cold meat with the air of a disappointed epicure. It has often gone to my heart to see the choicest parts of a fine leg of mutton cut off for a dog, while famishing fellow-creatures were perishing with hunger in the streets. The mistress of this dog once received a rebuke, which I hoped would be attended with good effect. On remarking one day to the footman that the baker's bill was very large, and that she thought it impossible that the family could use all the fancy biscuit that was charged, the man answered: 'Why, ma'am, perhaps you forget that Carlos eats about a shilling's worth of biscuit every day.' This is all very wrong. Dogs should certainly have plenty of good wholesome food; but to create artificial wants, and pamper them till life becomes a burden, is, to say the least of it, very mistaken kindness.

If anything can excuse an excessive fondness for dogs, it is their devoted attachment to their masters. In the course of my reading, I lately fell in with the following anecdotes, which illustrate in a remarkable manner the point in question:—

An officer named St Leger, who was imprisoned at Vincennes during the wars of St Bartholomew, wished to keep with him a greyhound that he had brought up, and which was much attached to him; but they harshly refused him this innocent pleasure, and sent away the greyhound to his house in the Rue des Lions St Paul. The next day, the greyhound returned alone to Vincennes, and began to bark under the windows of the tower, towards the place where the officer was confined. St Leger approached, looked through the bars, and was delighted again to see his faithful hound, which began to jump and play a thousand gambols to shew her joy. Her master threw a piece of bread to the animal, which ate it with great good-will. St Leger did the same in his prison, and, in spite of the immense wall which separated them, they breakfasted together like two friends. This friendly visit was not the last. Abandoned by his relations, who believed him dead, the unfortunate prisoner received the visits of his greyhound only, during four years' confinement. Whatever weather it might be, in spite of rain or snow, the faithful animal did not fail a single day to pay her accustomed visit. Six months after his release from prison, St Leger died. The faithful greyhound would no longer remain in the house, but on the day after the funeral returned to the Castle of Vincennes, and it is supposed she was actuated by a motive of gratitude. A jailer of the outer court had always shewn great kindness to this dog, which was as handsome as affectionate. Contrary to the custom of people of that class, this man had been touched by her attachment and beauty, so that he facilitated her approach to see her master, and also insured her a safe retreat. Penetrated with gratitude for this service, the greyhound remained the rest of her life near the benevolent jailer. It was remarked, that even while testifying her zeal and gratitude for her second master, one could easily see that her heart was with the first. Like those who, having lost a parent, a brother, or a friend, come from afar to seek consolation by viewing the place which they inhabited, this affectionate animal repaired frequently to the tower where St Leger had been imprisoned, and would contemplate for hours together the gloomy window from which her dear master had so often smiled to her, and where they had so frequently breakfasted together.

In January 1799, the cold was so intense, that the Seine was frozen to the depth of fifteen or sixteen inches. Following the example of a number of thoughtless youths, who were determined to continue the amusement of skating in spite of a thaw having commenced, a young student, called Beaumanoir, wished also to partake of this dangerous pleasure, near the quay of the Hôtel des Monnaies of Paris; but he had scarcely gone twenty steps, when the ice broke under his weight, and he disappeared. The young skater had carried a small spaniel with him, which, seeing his master sink under the ice, immediately gave the alarm, by barking with all his might near the spot where the accident had happened. It will easily be believed that it was impossible to give any assistance to the unfortunate youth, but the howlings of the animal warned others from approaching the fatal place. The poor spaniel sent forth the most frightful howls: he ran along the river as if he were mad; and at last, not seeing his master return, he went to establish himself at the hole where he had seen him disappear, and there he passed the rest of the day and all the following night. The day after, people saw with surprise the poor animal sorrowfully at the same post. Struck with admiration of such constancy, some of them made him a little bed of straw, and brought him some food; but, absorbed in the most profound grief, he would not even drink the milk which these kind-hearted people placed near him. Sometimes he would run about the ice or the borders of the river to seek his master, but he always returned to sleep in the same place. He bit a soldier who was attempting to make him leave his inhospitable retreat, who, fearing that he was mad, fired at, and wounded him. This affecting example of grief and constancy was witnessed for many days, and people came in crowds to contemplate this beautiful trait of attachment, which was not without its reward. The dog being only slightly wounded, was taken charge of by a woman, who, compassionating his suffering, and touched by the affection he shewed for his late master, carried him to her house, where his wound was dressed, and every effort that kindness could devise was practised, to console him for the loss of the young skater.

A young student of Montpellier, called Renaudin, being run over by a horse which a little vagabond rode full gallop to the watering-place, his skull was fractured, and he died upon the spot. A wolf-dog which he had reared, and which he had retained near him from infancy, threw himself on the body of his master, and began to howl in a dreadful manner. But who can describe the despair of the affectionate animal when he saw the body of the unfortunate youth enclosed in the coffin? Nothing, however, could separate them, and he followed him even to the tomb. Stretching himself on the grave, he refused all nourishment for five days: at last, at the end of that time, some of the comrades of the youth succeeded in making him eat a little bread dipped in milk; but he never would abandon his post; and there, in sunshine or storm, heat or cold, he remained. Loving him for his affection for their companion, the young students made a small house for him near his master's grave, and contributed morsels for his support. The affectionate animal remained there for no less than five years, and during all this period he never moved twenty steps from the spot. It is a circumstance worthy of remark, that, from the moment the faithful animal confined himself to the cemetery, he would never allow any one of his own species to come near him: he would neither run about nor play with those which came from time to time to visit him in his solitude; and when they barked, on purpose to provoke him, he hid himself in his house, and remained there plunged in grief. When this animal died, he was buried near the friend he had lamented with so much constancy. He is still quoted in the province as a model of friendship; his attachment has even passed into a proverb ; and when the natives speak of those who are only friends of the purse, they say : ‘ Oh, as for him, he is not worth the dog of Renaudin.’

A little spaniel survived a whole family who were fondly attached to him. The father, the mother, two grandchildren, and three sons, were successively attacked by the plague which raged at Marseilles, and they all died in the space of seven or eight days. As, one by one, these unfortunates were carried to the grave, the disconsolate animal followed their coffins, and returned to the house, sending forth the most lamentable howls. When the last of this family was entombed, the inconsolable spaniel would not remain in the house, which was now inhabited by strangers, who, charmed with his good disposition, lavished every kindness on him : he only came every two or three days to take a little food, immediately after which he returned to the cemetery, and on this account, the affectionate animal received the name of the Dog of the Tombs. It is the custom in that country for every one to have a separate grave. During the seven years that this grateful animal lived, he remained constantly stretched on the tomb of his masters ; and as he had been caressed by all, he divided amongst them, by turns, his profound and sincere regrets. It was remarked, however, that he had a particular predilection for the grave of the youngest son, who was cut off at the age of seven years, and who had lavished on him a thousand infantine caresses. This faithful animal mourned over the grave, and tried to tear up the earth with his feet, as if seeking to rejoin his young friend. Touched with this instance of gratitude and affection, the neighbouring villagers often conducted their children to the place of sepulture of this virtuous family, to shew them a beautiful example of constancy and gratitude, as exhibited by the Dog of the Tombs.

ADVENTURES OF A HIGHLAND OFFICER IN THE AMERICAN WAR.

IN a late visit to the Highlands, and while residing with a friend in a secluded situation near the shores of Loch Ness, the following little narrative, descriptive of the adventures of an officer in the American war, was related to me by one of the young persons of the family. It appeared so interesting, that I immediately wrote it down, and now present it to the world, almost word for word as it was narrated:—

‘ Uncle Charles was a fine, tall, handsome-looking youth, about nineteen, when he decided upon going into the army; and a commission having been procured for him in the gallant 42d, he left home to join the regiment, which in the course of a few months embarked at a very short notice for the American provinces, betwixt which and Great Britain a regular war had commenced. Mrs Grant, whose favourite son Charles was, parted from him with great regret; but having fortified his mind by good principles and the best example, she committed him to the care of Providence. Charles had lost his father when he was quite a child, so that he was left entirely to the instruction of his mother; and it was fortunate that she had such a soil whereon to sow the good seed, that produced the fruits that will be seen in his adventurous life.

‘ The regiment arrived safe at New York; and as soon as the soldiers had recovered from the voyage, they were ordered to march into the interior, to join their brethren in arms, as the officer commanding the troops in that part of the country understood that the Americans had prevailed upon a tribe of Indians, from Lake Michigan, to aid them against the British. The chief of this tribe had become well known to the Americans, as he and his followers were in the habit of visiting the frontiers yearly, to exchange their furs, fish, and other products of their country, for firearms, powder, and shot, which were most useful to them; so that the Americans found it no difficult matter to engage Michigan John and his tribe as an ally in the war; and John, who was a man of no common mind, not only picked up sufficient of the English language to make himself intelligible, but he had a powerful mind, and ruled over his tribe with despotic sway. The Indians, who were well acquainted with every foot of the country, were found by the Americans to be invaluable; and an ambuscade was planned to entrap the 42d ere it could reach its destination. They were only too successful; for, in marching through a wood, the 42d was attacked suddenly, and taken at a great disadvantage. From behind the trees, the deadly rifle laid low many a brave fellow; and, fearing to be cut off to a man, a retreat was sounded, with the hope of returning to more open ground; and the dreaded war-whoop of the savages could hardly fail to strike terror into the minds of soldiers who had never encountered such a ferocious-looking enemy.

' The Americans being aware that the loss of their officers would render the men a more easy conquest, took aim accordingly; and Charles, who nobly stood his ground, was singled out by the Indian chief, and he fell severely wounded; and the Indians rushing into the mélée, began to strip the dead and scalp the dying. Michigan John, who had perceived that Charles was an officer from his dress, advanced to where he lay, and, raising his head by the long hair, he lifted the deadly tomahawk, and, whirling it round, he was on the point of scalping his victim, when my uncle moved one of his arms, as if to put his hand upon the wound; and Indian John, finding he still breathed, spared his life. Summoning four of his tribe, they hastily cut down some branches from the trees, and, making a sort of litter, my uncle having had a bandage tied over his wound, he was placed in the litter, and by nightfall the Indians were on their way to Lake Michigan, laden with the booty which the Americans and they had divided. Some days elapsed ere they reached their home, the poor captive so weak and exhausted by the loss of blood, that he could hardly make the smallest exertion, and it required all the care of the Indian chief to keep him alive.

'The warriors were received with shouts of triumph by their wives and companions, who had remained to guard their encampment, mingled with cries and lamentations for those who had fallen in battle. My uncle, upon the arrival of the Indians in the Michigan territory, was taken to the wigwam of their chief, and herbs were gathered and applied to his wound, so that he gradually recovered; and in the midst of such kind-hearted savages he felt exceedingly grateful, but above all to the chief. But one may imagine his horror and dismay, when John informed him that his life was only preserved that he might be offered up as a sacrifice to the manes of those who had been killed on the day of the battle. To have met with death in the field would have been little compared with the fate that awaited him, and his entreaties that the chief would at once put an end to his life, were not listened to. John replied, it was the custom of the tribe, and that he ought not to have invaded the land of the Red Men; and my uncle perceiving that there existed not the smallest chance of escape for him, endeavoured to prepare his mind for the trial that awaited him; and he employed many hours of the day, and in the silent watches of the night, in praying for fortitude and strength to die as a Christian, from the only source at which it can be found.

'With a composure of manner and appearance which even to himself appeared somewhat unnatural, my uncle saw the preparations that were taking place, and was relieved in a great measure by learning that he was not to be put to torture, but that he was to be shot—a favour that he did not expect. His manly bearing and amiable manners had softened the heart in some degree of old John, and he would gaze with a steadfast and thoughtful look, when in a corner of the wigwam he saw the young white-skin speaking to the Great Spirit, and heard the earnest petitions of the young soldier for his mother, and for forgiveness of his own sins; and old John felt how proud he would have been of such a son to succeed him as chief of the Michigans.

'At length, my uncle having recovered, a day was fixed, and the whole tribe were assembled in their war-dresses, the women and children shouting and singing the death-song, as John, accompanied by his captive, appeared; and the chief making a short palaver to his followers, they all followed their leader to the wood that adjoined their encampment; and a tree being selected for the purpose, my uncle was placed against it, John having granted him the favour that he should not be bound, nor his eyes covered, saying he was not afraid to look death in the face, and hoping that the Indian would take so sure an aim as to be fatal at the moment. John loaded his rifle; and when the signal was given, he presented it at his victim. The trigger was pulled, but the powder flashed in the pan. With an impatient air, John examined his rifle, put in fresh powder, and again presented. Again was the attempt unsuccessful. A third time would surely finish the affair, for the flint was sharpened, and fresh priming put in the pan. The rifle again missed fire. Anxiety, doubt, and consternation sat upon every face, as the chief looked round upon his tribe. As if struck by the thought of the moment, he raised the gun in his hand, and fired in the air, when it exploded with a tremendous noise, as the Indians gave out cries and shouts of surprise.

'After a pause of a few minutes, and silence had been restored, the chief addressed them. "My children, it's of no use to kill this white-skin: he is protected by the Great Spirit. When did you see the gun of Michigan John miss fire? The Great Spirit says: No. Listen, my children: I have no son, and this young white-skin shall become as one to your father. When I am old, and go to the land of my fathers, he shall be your chief. We shall teach him to hunt and to fish, and he will be as the son of the Red Man."

' This address was received with joyful acclamations ; and my uncle, like one in a dream, was carried back to the wigwam upon the shoulders of Indians, who, leaving him to the care of his adopted father, spent the day in mirth and dancing. My uncle, whose life was thus wonderfully spared, never for a moment doubted that it was solely by the interposition of Providence, and gave thanks where it was due. A day was soon after appointed to adopt my uncle as the chief who was to rule the tribe after the old chief's death ; and he underwent the ceremonies observed amongst the savage tribes of North America. His body was handsomely tattooed, his ears pierced, and also his nose, to all of which were appended ornaments ; and his skin being stained, and attired in the full war-dress of an Indian chief, with the rifle, the deadly tomahawk, and scalping-knife, he was, I am told, a very handsome-looking person. The ceremony concluded by his having the name of John bestowed upon him.

' Only too grateful to have his life spared, young John soon fell into all the customs of his new friends. He accompanied his father in the chase, and became an expert huntsman ; and this roving and exciting occupation became delightful to him. If he had any ambition, here it might be gratified : he would, at some future period, preside over a numerous body of Indians, who felt some degree of awe for one who was guarded by the Great Spirit. Youth soon reconciles itself to a situation that is not uncomfortable upon the whole ; and young John, who was particularly attached to the chief, seemed to forget that he was not a red-skin from the first. His promotion, although approved of by the greater number of the tribe, had raised some envy and jealousy amongst those who were related to John, and they only waited an opportunity to do him an injury. And so it chanced. When some of the tribe, accompanied by my uncle, were out hunting, a huge panther was tracked and fired at; and as the Indians pursued the animal closely, he took refuge in a cave, and every attempt to dislodge him was found to be vain. It was now the time for the discontented to endeavour to get rid of their rival, and with furious threats, they insisted that he should enter the cave, and drive out the panther. This attempt he looked upon as certain death, as the cave was so low that he must have gone in on his hands and knees. But expostulation and remarks upon the injustice of their conduct were only answered by a blow of the tomahawk; and seeing there was no alternative, he crept in upon his hands, holding his scalping-knife between his teeth. The cave was so dark, that some minutes elapsed before he could distinguish the animal, which had retreated into a corner of the den, in the agonies of death, having been mortally wounded by one of the Indians. My uncle having advanced cautiously, drew his knife across the throat of the panther, and seizing him by the tail, dragged him out of the den, and with an air of indignation, threw him down before the astonished savages, who, humbled and crest-fallen, were convinced that he bore a charmed life, and that it was fruitless to endeavour to injure him.

‘Three years were passed away by my uncle amongst the Indians; and having accumulated a considerable number of skins, and other products of their country, John proposed that a party of the tribe should proceed to the United States, to exchange them for powder and shot, which they now stood much in need of. Accordingly, he, with his adopted son, and seven of their followers, proceeded to Charleston. Here it was that my uncle recognised one of the officers of the 42d. Home and all its sweet associations rushed into his heart, and he went up directly and addressed his old companion in arms, who, if possible, was more astonished at hearing a young Indian speak in his own language. It was some time before he could be brought to acknowledge his identity. His adopted father was all this while standing beside them, his anxious, piercing looks full of anxiety, which was increased when he found that my uncle intended accompanying the officer to his quarters, where he followed them.

'A long and interesting conversation took place, and his friend represented in the strongest terms the folly of spending his life amidst a tribe of savages, and recalled to my uncle the duty he owed to his parent, his king, and his country; in return, my uncle pleaded all he owed to his adopted father. His friend did not press the subject too keenly at the moment; but having written to the commanding officer the history of Charles's captivity, an order was despatched to Charles, claiming him as a British officer, and commanding him to join his regiment with as little delay as possible.

'There was no disputing this order, as he would be considered a deserter; and he had the painful duty of explaining this to Michigan John, who was overwhelmed with grief. He endeavoured by every means in his power to prevail on my uncle to go home with him. "Return, return, my son, John, with your old father! Why should you seek again to become a white-skin? Oh! my son, John, break not the heart of your Indian father!" Everything was done to comfort and console him, but with little success, until the old chief made up his mind that the Good Spirit called his son away to his own people; and after choosing the best of the furs, and everything that he thought would be valued, he took a last parting farewell, and turned his face towards the Lake Michigan. My uncle proceeded to New York, where his extraordinary adventures had travelled before him, and every one was anxious to see the handsome Indian chief. This desire was most strongly felt by the ladies; and a fair American girl, who heard him relate his romantic tale with modesty and ingenuousness, shewed that she loved him for the dangers he had passed; and he was too gallant a soldier not to be flattered by the interest she expressed. And while he gained a step in the 42d, he lost his heart in New York; and fearing to be called a heartless man, he had nothing for it but to agree to an exchange or barter. The regiment was ordered to England, and Charles along with it. If his adventures had made a sensation in New York, he was still a greater lion in London. And one of his majesty's ministers wrote my uncle, that it would be agreeable that he should spend an evening at his house, and that a certain member of the royal family would honour the company with his presence, having a desire to see him, in the Indian costume, dance the celebrated war-dance. All of these requests my uncle did not consider himself at liberty to refuse, and acquitted himself so well, that his dance and tremendous war-whoop electrified the whole assembly.

'After remaining a short time in London, he returned home to his native glen, to visit his relations; and recollecting, after a reasonable time, that his heart was on the other side of the Atlantic, and finding himself uncomfortable without it, he set out again for New York, to unite himself to his lady-love; leaving, as parting gifts, his Indian dress, tomahawk, and scalping-knife, which are hung up in the hall as memorials of the true tale of Michigan John, alias Charles Grant of Glen.'

TRIP ON THE CLYDE AND LOCH LOMOND.

AT six o'clock precisely, on a fine morning of June, we—that is to say, a friend and I, tourists both—met at the Broomielaw, to start for Loch Lomond. We had our choice of two steamers at that hour, both of them lying a few yards below the New Glasgow Bridge, and close to each other. After being subjected to a little rival solicitation, we went on board of one, and about five minutes after six, the steam was put on, and the vessel commenced her route.

There is a delightful exhilaration of spirits, resulting from the rapid cleaving of the fresh cool morning air which accompanies the motion of a steam-boat. The sensation resembles closely the buoyancy attendant on horseback exercise. Such, at least, was the nature of our own feelings on this summer morn. For a considerable way below Glasgow, the banks of the Clyde do not present any objects of remarkable interest. We get glimpses, it is true, of villas and smoke-emitting villages here and there in the distance, but we wish to confine our remarks more immediately to the river-side. A few miles down, on the left bank, a ruined mansion appears, which was once a seat of the noble family of Sempill, one of the decayed Scottish houses, which are deeply interesting from the distinguished figure which they played in our history of old. The Sempills were noted through several generations for their poetical abilities. The song of Maggie Lauder, and that called, She rose and loot me in, were the productions of one of the family in James VII.'s time. They had large possessions once in Renfrewshire, as the names of 'Castle Semple' and other places indicate to this day. The ruined house on the Clyde is still, we believe, the property of the inheritor of the family honours—the Baroness Sempill. We do not know how other Scotsmen feel in these times on the subject, but we confess that it goes to our own heart to think of the decay of our old historical houses, and such ruins as these are full of a melancholy interest in our eyes. In itself, the crumbling mansion is noway remarkable, being comparatively modern in its architecture.

About five miles below Glasgow, the shire of Dumbarton begins on the right bank of the Clyde, and presents a number of fine seats to the eye of the steam-boat traveller, in the course of the several miles of coast above the town of Dumbarton. As you draw near to the latter place, a projecting point is shewn to you, close on the river, where it is said the Roman Wall between the Forth and Clyde terminated. In the neighbourhood of this promontory appears a remarkable hill or eminence, of a volcanic or basaltic character, and styled Dumbuck. But by far the most striking object, we need scarcely say, in this region, is one which fills the eye and attracts the chief attention of the voyager for many miles ere he reaches it—the rock and castle of Dumbarton. The rock is, at its loftiest point, 560 feet in height, and has a most extraordinary effect on the eye, from the abrupt manner in which it shoots up from the water, or rather from the alluvial beach formed by the confluence of the River Leven with the Clyde. Dumbarton Castle rock measures one mile nearly in circumference, and splits, about half way up its ascent, into two peaks, the one a very little lower than the other. On the peaks, there are buildings, or the remains of buildings, but the chief erections occupy the middle of the rock, and the fork between the summits. These dwellings are inhabited by a small garrison; but all that art has done to the pyramid, looks most scurvily inefficient, when compared with the naked strength and grandeur of its natural position and appearance. We had a fine opportunity of seeing it fully, being rowed under and almost around it by the boatmen, who pulled out from the mouth of the Leven on the approach of our steamer, and conveyed us on shore. (Some steamers go up the Leven to Dumbarton, but this was going direct to Clyde foot.) We saw the part of the rock which was ascended in the night-time, in the days of Wallace, by a few soldiers, who captured the castle. The difficulty of the feat seems to have mainly consisted in the time chosen for it, as good cragsmen can ascend by the same place at the present day, without so much peril as generally attends any attempt to imitate the traditional feats of old. It is but fair, however, to say, that when we—looking at the spot—declared our belief of having done deeds of as great ‘derring-do’ in our day, the boatmen shook their heads with a rather mortifying smile of incredulity, though—not having yet received their fare—common prudence and civility forbade them to shew their disbelief further. The rock is basaltic in its character.

Being put on shore a few yards below Dumbarton town, we walked up to it, and entered the Elephant Inn to get breakfast, before the coach started at nine o'clock to take us across the strip of country lying between us and Loch Lomond. As a measure of precaution, we immediately engaged seats in the said coach, paying for them the sum of one shilling and threepence each. We then made an excellent breakfast, and went out to spend the few minutes we had still to spare, in examining the town. Dumbarton is a small place, consisting principally of one street, at the back of which lies the Leven, with a few boats moored on its waters. The houses are of a humble and even mean order ; nor were there any signs of stir or business about the town, though it is the capital of the shire.

Off went the coach at nine for the loch, between which and Dumbarton there is a beautiful tract of country, above four miles in length, along the Leven's banks. One of the most interesting objects on this route is the obelisk, erected on the west side of the road, about two miles from Dumbarton, to the memory of Tobias Smollett, the novelist. The old mansion-house of Dalquhurn, in which he was born, stood at a little distance from this spot, and the family of Smollett of Bonhill, of which he was a cadet, is still a flourishing one in the district. Two or three considerable villages, the largest called Renton and Alexandria, add beauty to the scene in this quarter. The loch narrows so gradually into its effluent stream, the Leven, that it is difficult to tell at what precise spot the loch commences at its southern end. However, about four miles and a quarter from Dumbarton, you turn down from the road to the river-side, and there find a steamer ready to receive you, and to sail immediately up the lake. Being discharged from the coach, we went on board, and found everything neat and clean to admiration. In general, the steamer requires to be towed up a little way, on account of the shallowness of the water ; but the previous rains enabled her on this occasion to start at once without such aid. We were soon on the broad bosom of Loch Lomond, and saw before us some of the large islands which beautify the sheet at the lower end. The first of these which we came to, is called Inch Murrin, a long copse-covered island, which the Duke of Montrose uses as a deer-park. We were fortunate enough to get a distant glimpse of one deer of a pure white colour—a rare species of the breed. An old ruined fortalice is also seen here, entitled Lennox Castle, and said to have been a seat of the ancient Earls of Lennox. The name of Lennox, which is contracted from Levenax, is now borne, with a dukedom of the same name, by the English Dukes of Richmond, whose real family appellation, however, is Stewart, they being descended (illegitimately) from the royal family of Stuart. Moving onwards along the eastern side of the loch, we saw to the left hand a number of other islands, including Inch Cro (the Isle of Cattle), Torr Inch (the Wood Isle), Inch Caillach (the Isle of Women, so named from having been the site of a nunnery), and Clar Inch (Flat Island). Buchanan House, the seat of the Duke of Montrose, proprietor of the greater part of the country on the eastern shore of the lake, is not seen from the steamer, but the extensive woods among which it lies form a beautiful prospect. Indeed, the passage of the vessel around these islands gave one of the most delightful spectacles to the eye which it could possibly rest on. Leaving the west shore to be viewed in returning, the vessel coasted still along the eastern side, and we beheld other islands, of which Inch Fadd, Inch Moan, and Inch Cruin, are the principal. Inch Cruin contains an asylum for the insane. Thirty islands in all, small and large, deck the bosom of Loch Lomond, being chiefly situated at the lower end. After leaving the chief group behind, the lake lost none of its loveliness in our eyes, its broad tenantless expanse, walled round by lofty hills, seeming to us a spectacle equal in attractions to what we had passed. The lofty sides and summit of the lord of the region, Ben Lomond, had been long in sight—even from Dumbarton—and we now approached its steep sides, sloping abruptly into the lake. We had now sailed about twelve miles—half way—up the loch, and the smoke of Rowardennan Inn curled up before us on the eastern shore. We have much to say about Rowardennan.

dell or ravine formed by this stream we directed our steps, and had not gone far until we began to surmise that this was one of the richest places to which an amateur of the natural sciences could bend his course. The ground, or rather rocks, on which we trod, presented pure white quartz at every step. Every craggy mass shewed blocks of it peeping through—so much so, that we cannot help conceiving a great part of the base, at least, of Ben Lomond, to be formed of quartz. Moreover, we found stones in great plenty in which glittering mica was abundantly mixed up. Various other geological appearances interested us; and our interest was not diminished, when, on entering one of the lanes or paths in the low copsewood, we found the region to be equally rich in vegetable productions. Wild-flowers were scattered around profusely, exhibiting every tint and shade, from the bright-yellow broom to the purple foxglove (or deil's thimble, as we used to call it at school) and the bonny blue-bell. These, however, are comparatively common flowers of the wild, but on Ben Lomond braes there are others of a rarer kind. In one little nook on the burn mentioned, we found no less than six varieties of one single flower, which, unfortunately, we are unable to name. The hues of these varieties ranged between a pure white and a streaked purple. All the intermediate varieties were also streaked; and more learned naturalists may know the flower, when we state it to have had a straight stalk, with the petals, small and numerous, projected from its topmost part, in the form of a neat cone. It resembles much the full-blown flower of Lucerne grass, and most probably is a species of grass akin to that. This was but one of the many flowers which we saw, and which were, to us at least, rare denizens of the fields and woods. The nook referred to was remarkable on other accounts. We reached it by creeping up the sides of the channel of the burn, and turning a sharp angle. A deep, dark pool lay at the bottom of the nook, formed by a sheet of water, white as snow, that streamed over a high perpendicular rock above. From the steep banks on each side, the rough-leaved alder and the birch shot out their arms, almost closing out the light of day. Beneath them, the ground was thickly covered with the green and yellow broom, foxglove, and other flowers of various tints. Altogether, the contrast of colours presented in this retired nook was as charming as astonishing ; and we thought to ourselves, that if Rob Roy, who often found a hiding on Ben Lomond, had searched it round and round, he could not have discovered a sweeter or more secure spot than this. And, indeed, seeing that much of the copsewood appears to be natural, and consequently of long standing, there is no improbability in thinking that the renowned freebooter may have lain on the banks of this pool, listening to the sparkling dash of the cataract, and watching the trouts—for fish are there—disporting below ; while, at the same time, he may have been meditating revenge for the unrelenting hatred of the neighbouring chieftain of the Grahams, the lordly Montrose. It was pleasant, at all events, to fancy this, while one stood gazing on the beauties of this delightful nook.

If the land has many attractions, in the sweet summer prime, at Rowardennan, not less engaging are its aquatic advantages. One or two small neat skiffs or boats lie constantly on the shores of the bay, in which visitors may enjoy all the pleasures of a pull on the loch ; though we hope all who read this would scorn the dishonourable trick, played on the day before we were there, by two fellows—gentlemen in seeming—who took one of the boats across the lake, and having reached the other side, deserted it, and were not seen again. Besides breaking their faith, they broke an oar, which they left with their undischarged bill as a memorial of their presence. Though so deep in the more northern parts of it, as to range between sixty and a hundred fathoms, there is little danger of any accident in boating upon the loch. And yet it has been famed for presenting ‘ waves without winds ;’ which, most probably—if there be any truth in the saying—is caused by the influx of rills in its upper part. ‘Fish without fins, and a floating island,’ are said to be also among the wonders of the loch. The finless creatures were probably vipers passing between the isles; and the floating island is understood to have been a fragment of moss, which has now been long settled. The delicious fish of which the lake is full, would make Rowdennan, or any other neighbouring spot, a glorious scene for a day or two’s angling. What with boating and fishing, indeed, and occasionally stepping up the six-mile-long sides of Ben Lomond for a view, the time might pass away delightfully here. Edinburgh and Stirling Castles, Ailsa Rock, and the isles of Bute and Arran, and even the coast of Ireland, are visible in a fine day from the summit. In truth, being almost entirely isolated, the prospect which Ben Lomond commands is almost unparalleled in extent.

But we must now—reluctantly—leave Rowdennan. We have dined, and the steam-boat has returned from the head of the lake. The boat which puts us on board of the steamer takes out of it two persons, a lady and gentleman, whom we look at with interest. The gentleman seems a man under forty, handsome, good-looking, and plainly though respectably attired. The lady is considerably younger—not much above twenty to appearance—very sweet-looking, and more plainly dressed than her companion. We had seen this pair formerly come on board, and seat themselves in a quiet way among the other passengers, but had paid little further attention to them. We now, however, looked at them with interest, for we had learned that these were the lordly rulers of the scene—that theirs were the lake and the hill—almost all, in short, that we saw around. As far as politeness would permit, we glanced at the gentleman’s countenance, endeavouring to trace the lineaments of the great Montrose. It might be partly fancy, but we could not help thinking that the duke—for it was the present head of the house of Graham whom we now saw—most strikingly resembled the common portraits of his famous ancestor. We could not but think it a pleasing trait in these noble persons, that they should come out in this simple way to enjoy themselves amongst their fellow-creatures, instead of yawning or yachting it, in all the unapproachable dignity of rank and riches.

Again we have digressed, but we now begin to sail down the loch in good earnest. In its return, the steamer always takes the west side, to permit the passengers to see that shore in turn. The first point of much interest which we saw here was the little village of Luss, situated delightfully on a promontory, and a place much resorted to in summer. A little farther down we again entered among the islands, sometimes beholding new ones, and sometimes the old in new lights. At the same time on the west shore, we saw a number of fine seats in succession; among others, Arden (Buchanan), Belvidere, and Belretiro. Not to linger on what we have perhaps said too much about already, we finally reached Balloch—the place where we started—left the vessel, and took to coach again. As soon as this vehicle arrived at Dumbarton, the steamer, which was lying ready at the quay, took us on board, and started immediately for Glasgow. We reached the Broomielaw safely at nine in the evening.

Here, having finished this excursion, let us say a word of expenses. The fare by the steamer from Glasgow to Dumbarton is 1s.; coach to Balloch, 1s. 3d.; boat up the loch, 2s.; down again, 2s.; coach to Dumbarton again, 1s. 3d.; steamer to Glasgow, 1s.—in all, 8s. 6d. Of course, victuals, which can be got in all variety in the steam-boats, are to be added to this sum; but, taking it all in all, we conceive that a cheaper and more pleasant trip can scarcely be made anywhere. Recently, the trip has been facilitated by a railway from a steam-boat station on the Clyde, to Balloch at the foot of the lake.

A TALE OF THE LATE WAR.

NOT a single cloud floated over the clear blue sky, and the full effulgence of a September sun was reflected in the brightest gold from the dancing waters of the broad sea, whose glittering wavelets came rippling in with gentle sounds. The pier at Ramsgate exhibited gay groups assembled to witness one of those exhilarating scenes which so often took place during the late war—the embarkation of troops for foreign service. A small fleet of transports, gaily decorated, their sails bent and colours flying, formed an interesting portion of the spectacle. From the decks of these vessels came the peculiar and picturesque sounds which, when mellowed by distance, have a thrilling effect upon the ear—the animating cries of the sailors, who on board the smaller class of merchant-ships still weigh the anchor and hoist the sails to the wild chant of ‘Yoe, heave - ho !’ These sea - strains came mingled with the spirit-stirring notes of a regimental band upon the shore, where, ever and anon, the sharp blast of the trumpet, and the loud peal of the drum, broke in upon softer melodies, affording types and images of the vicissitudes of military life. Boats were passing to and from the beach, filled with gallant hearts, high in hope and in courage, the greater number delighted with the opening of their adventurous career, and none as yet weary and toil-broken, or casting vain regrets towards those homes which many were destined never to behold again.

The younger portion of the male spectators, whose more peaceful lot was placed in scenes of inglorious ease, cast envious looks upon the brilliant pageant ; for every female eye beamed with delighted encouragement, and sent radiant glances towards the chivalric band, who, with cheers and shouts of exultation, quitted their native country to combat with a foreign foe. Not one of the young and fair creatures gazing with elated hearts upon the splendid array, could in this moment of excitement rejoice that their male relatives were secured from the horrors of war ; to their inexperienced minds, the triumph of that proud hour seemed to be worth all of suffering of which they had as yet formed any notion. Alas ! how little did they know of the fearful price too frequently paid for that military glory which now seemed so dazzling and so precious ! Happy were those to whom the whole gay spectacle afforded merely the passing amusement of a morning-walk, who could go home and calm their excited feelings, and lose in other occupations all save a pleasing remembrance of the sights and sounds of the embarkation. There was a group overlooked amid the blaze of scarlet uniforms, and the waving of military plumes, which might have taught a sad lesson to those thoughtless gazers, who saw nothing beyond the bright side of the picture—the wives and families of the soldiers, who, permitted to accompany the regiment destined for foreign service, were, by the orders of government, directed to embark on board one of the transports fitted up as an hospital for the sick. These poor women were strangers at Ramsgate ; they had long ago quitted their native homes to follow the often miserable fortunes of their husbands ; and, now inured to hardships, had prepared to meet the dangers and hazards of a foreign campaign with a sort of reckless fortitude. But they had not anticipated the separation which had been deemed expedient ; and their situation was rendered unusually forlorn, by their being compelled to make the voyage unaccompanied by those who were wont to cheer them in periods of the utmost peril. One family, in particular, felt deeply the misery of submission to this arbitrary mandate — the wife and daughters of the sergeant-major of the regiment. Maxwell, amid the toils and dangers of a military career, had often regretted, for the sake of the patient partner in all his sufferings, that he had induced her to leave the rural cottage, where, far from the tumults of the world, she had spent her early days in tranquillity and comfort. Frequently in his mind's eye would arise the substantial dwelling of his unsuccessful rival; the rustic porch, mantled with a vine, leading into a well-cropped garden; the smiling fields, stretching to the back; the poultry gathering round the door; and the cow, whose fragrant breath came mingling with the perfume of the blossoming beans. Then the comfortable interior would contrast painfully with the squalid abodes in which he was but too often happy to find a shelter for his wife and children; the bright fire, the carved oaken chairs, the handsome clock, and the abundance of delf and pewter; where there was everything for use, and much for show.

Maxwell sighed as memory conjured up these things, and he wished that he had left his beloved Mary to be the contented mistress of so fair a home. Well did he recollect his own invasion of this paradise, the pride he had experienced in exhibiting his becoming uniform, military air, and superior intelligence, before the eyes of a girl who could not afterwards look with complacency upon the plain and homely suitor who had seen nothing beyond his native fields. Mary shared in the reminiscences, but not in the regrets: though long ago the fascinations of a red coat had lost all charm in eyes accustomed to the sad realities of a soldier's life, she never once lamented advantages which she could only have tasted in relinquishing the chosen of her virgin heart for another. Often, indeed, did she wish for such a rural retreat as she had left, yet never unless it was to be shared by the man for whom she was still ready to sacrifice every earthly good. Mrs Maxwell had borne the rough and thorny places of the path she had, perchance incautiously, ventured to tread, with enduring meekness, never once wearying in her efforts to impart comfort to the most desolate abode to which their wandering life would lead them. She maintained a decent pride under the most adverse circumstances; and though frequently pale and wasted by fatigue, and the absence of nourishing food, she and her children were always cleanly and respectably attired. The deserted wife had, upon former occasions, been left in camps and garrisons, while her husband had accompanied his regiment to the field ; but, excepting to go into action, she had never been separated from him before, and she felt the measure which was now adopted as one of peculiar cruelty and hardship. Maxwell entertained the same opinion, and too late he wished that he had made arrangements for the settlement of his family at home. More than once it had occurred to him, that he ought to have insisted upon their remaining in England during this campaign ; but his wife, discarded by her own relatives, and clinging solely to him, could not be persuaded of the advantages of the plan. How gladly would the husband and father have entered upon the present service alone, could he have felt certain that those he most loved in this world were in a place of security ! but to be parted from them while they were exposed to danger and distress, to sail in a different vessel, and thus be prevented from calming their fears, or procuring for them any alleviation under the pressure of bodily suffering, pierced him to the very soul. For the first time in his life, Maxwell felt himself to be unmanned. Margaret Maxwell, the elder daughter, a girl of twelve, was old enough to enter into all the feelings of her parents. Though born amid the din of arms, and brought up in a camp, she had little or none of the Amazon about her : courage she possessed, for she had faced danger, and learned to endure discomfort without murmuring ; but her tender and affectionate spirit recoiled from the boisterous gaiety which characterised many of her companions. From her childhood, she had felt strong, though secret yearnings, for a quiet and permanent home ; and her mother, in teaching her to avoid the evil examples of those with whom they were in some degree compelled to associate, presented such sweet pictures of domestic seclusion to her mind, that she learned to loath the public and vagrant sort of life which she was condemned to lead. Her courage failed in the present emergence; and when Maxwell, called away by his duty to superintend the embarkation of the privates of his corps, left her with an entreaty that she would support her mother through the trial, she could not obey him, but sat down upon the green in such utter broken-heartedness, as to subdue the glee of her younger companions, who until then had echoed the cheers of the soldiers, and danced to the inspiring music of the fife and drum.

The sun had set, and the gay crowd had dispersed before Maxwell's forlorn family had reached the vessel destined to receive them. The commencement of their voyage was inauspicious. Through the ignorance or carelessness of the pilot, the transport ran foul of another vessel, and sustained a greater degree of damage than was at first apprehended. Before they quitted the Channel, it fell astern of the rest of the fleet, and in the Bay of Biscay totally lost sight of the convoy. Considerable alarm was felt by the unfortunate passengers, apparently abandoned to their fate in the midst of a wild and stormy ocean; for the sea, according to that most expressive phrase, employed to describe its forthcoming tumults, was 'getting up.' Wave lashed itself on wave against the sides of the devoted bark; the master lost confidence; and the crew, feebly assisted by a few sick soldiers, found themselves inadequate to the management of the vessel, which was driven out of her course, and in a short time stranded on the coast of France. Mrs Maxwell, from the moment that she had parted from her husband, resigned herself to despair; prescient fears weighed upon her soul. On the evening of her departure, she looked upon the clouds which obscured the golden light of the magnificent orb that had a short time before so brilliantly illuminated the scene, and upon the dark waters through which the disabled bark made its sullen way, and she felt that the sun of hope and happiness would never rise for her again. She gathered her children round her, and, amid the frightful confusion of the tempest, calmly awaited the event. The vessel was indeed doomed to perish, and few of the luckless beings it contained survived the general wreck. The Maxwell family were, however, amid this small number. When the transport went to pieces, they clung to one of the masts, which had fallen across the place where they were all huddled together, and, though severely injured, and for some time lost to consciousness, escaped with life.

Mrs Maxwell, upon opening her eyes, found herself and her children in a very decent apartment of a French house, and attended by a kind-looking woman, who made herself well understood by the good offices which she lavished upon her unfortunate guests. Madelon St Alois was a widow, and childless; she was established in a good business at Bayonne, and had only come to the small town on the coast where the transport had been wrecked, to look after a property lately inherited. She became attached to Mrs Maxwell and her fair daughters, and began to consider whether she could not render them useful as assistants in her shop; and having sufficient interest in Paris to obtain the custody of her protégées, who were considered in the light of *détenu*s, rather than prisoners of war, she carried them with her to her own home. Painfully anxious to make her husband acquainted with her existence, Mrs Maxwell wrote repeatedly, and through every channel she could think of; but it was very difficult at that period to get a letter transmitted to England, and the ignorance of the language, which prevented her from communicating all her thoughts and wishes to her new friends, likewise threw many obstacles in her way. She, however, persevered; and in the fond expectation that the pleasing intelligence would reach the beloved object for whom it was intended, hope revived in her breast. Madame St Alois had no reason to repent the benevolent arrangements which she had made, for the family were very diligent and efficient. The young girls speedily learned to speak the language of the country, and, full of hope and animation, they were cheerful and happy. Mrs Maxwell, though grateful and even resigned, experienced many anxious feelings about her husband ; all her present comforts were embittered by a separation which rendered correspondence difficult, nay, perhaps, impossible. No answers arrived to her numerous letters—none from the agents of the regiment in London : at length there came intelligence of a great battle fought in Spain, in which, of course, in the Parisian bulletins, the victory was given to the French. The corps to which Maxwell belonged was stated in this account to have been entirely cut to pieces. A dreadful apprehension weighed upon the wife's heart ; yet still she did not give entire credit to intelligence coming from so doubtful a source. By this time, she had attained a tolerable degree of proficiency in the French language, while Margaret spoke it perfectly ; they could, therefore, communicate freely with all their acquaintance, and one kindly undertook to procure the London Gazette. With some difficulty, and after the lapse of a considerable period, this official document was obtained, and it gave a miserable confirmation of a part of the French statement : the regiment had suffered severely, and the name of Sergeant-Major Maxwell was amongst the list of the killed. The blow did not fall the less heavily for the delay : the patience with which the faithful wife had borne all the evils of her lot, changed to the deepest dejection ; she was oppressed by the gaiety of her French friends, and even the cheerfulness of her own children augmented her distress. Their smiles seemed to her to be a sort of profanation, when their father's bones lay mouldering, perhaps, upon the battle-field. The two younger girls grieved at their mother's unhappiness, and often checked themselves in the midst of their glee, as her sad looks reminded them of their father's fate ; but it was impossible for them to enter into her feelings, or to comprehend the depth and extent of her anguish ; and the shade of melancholy soon passed away from their brows, and they became gay and joyous as before. Margaret sympathised more tenderly in her mother's sorrow ; she was well acquainted with all the excellences of the parent she had lost ; she knew, that until the fatal parting, no misfortune or privation had rendered the hearts so fondly linked together impatient of their lot. The holy harmony of the domestic circle had never been disturbed, the devoted pair being certain of receiving the support and assistance from each other which each in turn could give. New scenes and new objects could not divert the mind of Margaret from dwelling upon the past. She could not help admitting, that, with respect to worldly circumstances, her family had gained by their shipwreck on the French coast ; but they were in a land of strangers, and she saw that her mother drooped under that homesickness which so often embitters the life of the exile. Mrs Maxwell, since this last bereavement, pined, indeed, for her native land. Often, during her pilgrimage through life, had she cast longing looks at those well-remembered scenes, wherein childhood and youth had been spent, but never did they recur so frequently as now, when she saw the destiny of her children, though not an unhappy one, cast in a foreign country, and could no longer hope to drag herself to the church-yard of her native village, and die upon the turf that covered the humble graves of so many of her ancestors. Meantime, the children grew up in strength and beauty, and Margaret had become a young woman. Thoughts of peace between England and France had long ceased to be indulged ; war seemed to be an inevitable necessity, only to end when no country remained to be conquered. Madame St Alois had taken Mrs Maxwell into partnership ; business flourished ; and but for one corroding care, the family would have been happy. Though life had lost all its charms in the mother's eye, still she wished to live for the sake of her children ; and while hope seemed dead in her heart, she was conscious occasionally of a feeling akin to it—a faint expectation mixed with her earnest desire that she should live to see England again, and that her parents would pardon her, and take her daughters to their bosom. About this time, her mind was disturbed by a dream, and she could scarcely determine upon the effect which it produced upon her, whether the idea it presented reconciled her to her situation, or revived all the keenness of anguish which she had suffered when the certainty of her bereavement reached her. She dreamed that Maxwell was alive, but that, in the full conviction that she and her daughters had perished in the stranded vessel, had married again, and was now the happy husband of a young and beautiful woman. This dream was never absent from her thoughts. Such an event might have happened, and Maxwell yet be blameless. Could she, with this chance now revealed to her, regret that he was dead ; that she had been spared a calamity more dreadful than any she had yet experienced ? Perplexed by so new a view of the circumstances of her situation, poor Mrs Maxwell now suffered from an apprehension that she was doing wrong ; and that, whether she ceased to lament the loss of her husband, or deplored a misfortune providentially occurring to preserve her from a more terrible fate, her feelings could not be blameless.

Though the people of Bayonne were kept in a considerable degree of ignorance concerning the events of the war in Spain, rumours of reverses both in the Peninsula and elsewhere were whispered abroad. The party inimical to the ruler of France, hitherto condemned to silence and patient endurance of a government which they disliked, now began to utter their sentiments, and to deprecate measures which they considered injurious to the welfare of the country. Slow to entertain hope, Mrs Maxwell could scarcely believe in the possibility of a free choice being offered to her with respect to a return to England. Could she fancy that some of her day-dreams would be realised, and that she should yet live to present her children to her own and to Maxwell's relatives ? How often had they talked together of a visit to the green hills of his native land, and how fondly had she anticipated the welcome she would receive in the homes of his kinsfolk ! The younger girls, pleased with the idea of change, were delighted with the prospect of peace, without knowing what it was to bring them ; and Margaret felt a strange joy at her heart at the thought of dividing her time between her English and her French home, for she loved the good Madame St Alois as a second mother. The reports, however, when they had attained a certain height, were silenced, and some time elapsed without bringing decisive intelligence of the state of the war, or the real aspect of public affairs. The greater part of the community seemed to be aware that a crisis was at hand, though perhaps few understood the actual state of events. The Maxwells had been accustomed to hear of war at a distance, but soon it was brought beneath the walls of the city which had sheltered them so long. They knew that the British were engaged in a desperate contest with the army of Soult. What were their sensations during their state of suspense, and when convinced beyond a shadow of a doubt that their countrymen had triumphed ! The gates of Bayonne were thrown open to the victors. It was pleasant to Madame St Alois to have so good an excuse to share in the joy of the conquerors, rather than in the mortification of the defeated party ; so she gladly assisted in decorating her house with garlands and white cockades, and in spreading tapestry over the balconies. Janet and Helen Maxwell had prepared baskets full of bouquets, and were wild with delight at the idea of greeting the British soldiers in their own language. Mrs Maxwell, overpowered by recollections of other days, could not look upon the well-known uniforms ; and Margaret fancied that she ought to stay by her mother's side, though longing with a painful eagerness to feast her eyes upon countenances which she had never expected to behold again. For some time she retained her post, but the first full burst of the trumpets shook her resolution : it was the same sound which had filled her ears on the pier at Ramsgate : she had listened to many French trumpets since, but they had not conveyed notes like these ; and scarcely knowing what she did, she rushed to the balcony, and gazed intently upon the soldiers as they passed. A shriek at length burst from her parted lips ; she flew down stairs out into the street, and, hurrying along, flung herself into the arms of a tall, erect, but toil-worn and weather-beaten man, exclaiming: ‘It is my father—it is my father!’ An officer who observed the scene, directed Maxwell, for he it was, to fall out of the ranks; and the bewildered man was carried rather than led into the house of Madame St Alois. Janet and Helen, though retaining no personal recollection of their father, comprehended the whole matter at once, and welcomed him with a thousand caresses. Margaret now sought her mother: she endeavoured to steal softly to the apartment in which she had left her, and to break the intelligence by degrees; but even her very footsteps betrayed extraordinary tidings. Mrs Maxwell looked up at once, and read in her daughter’s face something she knew not what, of joy. In another moment she exclaimed: ‘He is alive—you have seen him?’ and then a violent burst of tears enabled her to listen to the confirmation of her hopes. Who shall describe the joy of that meeting? Maxwell was indeed alone, and had never ceased to think of the wife and children whom he believed to be buried in the ocean. His name had been amongst the list of the killed, but he had survived after several days’ exposure on the field of battle. Compelled to go home for the recovery of his health, he had visited Scotland, and had also been received by the parents of his wife, who, too late, lamented their conduct to their daughter. To find his family thus prosperous, and in every way so well worthy of pride and affection, more than repaid him for all that he had suffered. Mrs Maxwell, too, how was she rewarded for the dreary past! Meekly and patiently as she had borne her afflictions, she sometimes accused herself of not having been sufficiently submissive to the will of Heaven, and felt that she scarcely deserved this excess of happiness. Madame St Alois, who loved nothing so well as merry faces, became at once a confirmed supporter of the Bourbons; and though for a time compelled to part with the family of her adoption, it was only to meet again. Maxwell, at the conclusion of the war, found no difficulty in obtaining his discharge. Though he had gained nothing besides honour during his long and meritorious services, his wife had been placed in a situation which enabled her to realise a sum sufficient for their future comfort; and at the death of the good Madame St Alois, the younger Maxwells were amply provided for by the bequest of all her savings.

JOHN SPENCE, A NATURAL MECHANICAL GENIUS.

JOHN SPENCE was the son of a tanner in Linlithgow, and from the early age of four or five years, exhibited a taste for mechanics. He could not study the subject in books, from his ignorance of the technical terms, but, as he grew up, he cultivated his favourite propensity by visiting many and various machines, observing them in motion, and meditating on the principles developed in their construction. Wheels and levers occupied all his boyish thoughts, and he was happy only when inventing, and constructing what he invented. At the age of twelve, he was sent to a shoemaker to learn that business, but was never indentured. Such was his readiness in taking up any handicraft employment, that, after looking on for a week or two in the shoemaker's workshop, he began the trade at his own hand, requiring no further superintendence to teach him its whole mystery.

Some years afterwards, having imbibed a dislike to the shoemaker trade, and being desirous of getting near some of the great machinery in Glasgow, John Spence went to that city, and made an unsuccessful attempt to procure employment in some of the factories there. He then returned to Linlithgow, where, to his great satisfaction, he obtained the humble place of keeper of a small steam-engine. His duty here was to oil the machinery and feed the furnace; and though his friends were altogether unable to conceive what pleasure he could find in such an occupation, he felt perfectly happy in it, from the opportunity it afforded him merely of seeing wheels in motion. Tired at length with the sameness of the scene, Spence, at the end of two years, returned to the trade of a shoemaker. But the mechanical powers still haunted his imagination, and he continued to invent and construct, neither to the benefit of his purse, nor to the satisfaction of his friends and his wife. In 1814, he was so much disgusted with the shoemaking, that he resolved to try the weaving trade. He constructed the whole apparatus of a loom, except the hiddles and the reed, got a professional weaver to put in the first web, and, without any other instruction, made cloth not distinguishable from the manufacture of those regularly bred to the business.

A restless desire to accomplish something of greater moment in the mechanic arts, appears to have soon led Spence away from the weaving scheme. Among other curious subjects, he turned his attention to the invention of travelling machines, where the moving power was to be supplied by the traveller's hands or feet. He came from Linlithgow to Edinburgh in a car of this kind, which was afterwards exhibited in the latter city. This car stood on four wheels, and could hold three persons, two of whom wrought at a time in propelling it by means of two handles acting on the wheels, and which handles revolved like those of bucket-wells or milk-churns. Various other machines, evincing much mechanical ingenuity, were invented by John Spence, but we are unable to describe these in detail, and now turn to the great feat which brought him into general notice, or rather, notoriety.

Spence was just the man to be tempted into the pursuit of the Will-o'-the-Wisp, called the Perpetual Motion. His scientific knowledge was too limited to guard him against the delusive belief in the practicability of such an invention; and the honours which would undoubtedly attend success, formed a most seductive prospect to his ambition. After directing his ingenuity long to this difficult point, he at last announced to his friends in Linlithgow, that he had attained the object of his desires.

This occurred between the years 1814 and 1818. After a time, the intelligence of the ingenious Linlithgow shoemaker's discovery of the perpetual motion spread generally over the country, and great numbers of strangers, scientific and otherwise, visited his house, and saw his machine. Everybody admired the ingenuity and seeming simplicity of the contrivance. In the Edinburgh Magazine for May 1818, a description of the invention is thus given. After stating the difficulty of explaining it clearly, the writer proceeds:—‘Suffice it to say, that a wooden beam, poised by the centre, has a piece of steel attached to one end of it, which is alternately drawn up by a piece of magnet placed above it, and down by another placed below it ; and that, as the end of the beam approaches the magnet, either above or below, the machine interjects a non-conducting substance, which suspends the attraction of the magnet approached, and allows the other to exert its powers. Thus, the end of the beam continually ascends and descends betwixt the two magnets, without ever coming into contact with either ; the attractive power of each being suspended precisely at the moment of nearest approach. As the magnetic attraction appears to be a permanently operating power, there appears to be no limit to the continuance of the motion, but the endurance of the materials of the machine.’ The novelty here, it will be seen, lies in the ingenious manner in which the magnetic power seems to be rendered inoperative, at the proper moment, by the intervention of the non-conductor. The magnet had often been thought of as the source of a perpetual movement, but Spence had the merit of inventing this mode of bringing it into play.

Such are the principles upon which the perpetual-motion machine of Spence was ostensibly constructed. Being seen by several persons of eminence, the inventor was recommended to bring his wonderful engine to Edinburgh, for exhibition before the great ones of the capital. He adopted the advice given to him, and came to Edinburgh in the middle of the year 1818. He at once excited the greatest attention among the scientific people, some of the most eminent of whom seem to have sincerely adopted the belief that Spence had succeeded in discovering the grand desideratum. The whole world ran after the extraordinary shoemaker of Linlithgow. The great machine itself was, after a time, shut up in a convenient place (on the Calton Hill, we believe), in order to test the perpetuity of its movements, and it was there visited by thousands. Drawings of it were exhibited in the streets, and the ingenious sect of the phrenologists examined the inventor's skull, where they found everything to coincide with the possession of great mechanical genius. There is one point in the report of the phrenologists upon Spence's head, which strikes us as extremely naïve, considering what came out afterwards. 'I found,' says the phrenological reporter, 'that he had a very large development of cautiousness ;' and afterwards, 'so far as I have been able to observe, he is very cautious ; and some persons who have been attempting to impetrata his secret from him, regarding the perpetual motion, will be able to confirm my testimony from their own experience.' When addressed himself on the subject, Spence said : ' You may judge yourself whether I am cautious .' All this, though reflecting credit rather than otherwise upon phrenology, tends to excite a smile when one considers how little Spence's real reason for caution and concealment was thought of at the time ; for, after a season, the perpetual movement came to a pause, like all earthly things ! The inventor had permitted no one to examine the interior of the machine, and was himself excluded from doing what he chose to it ; and, in consequence, the movement came to an end, after having continued for about a month. It was then found, that the operation of the magnetic power was merely the ostensible cause of the movement, and that the real source was a large spring in the interior. The machine ran out in the same way as does an eight-day clock.

The deception which Spence had practised was certainly an unjustifiable one, and he was punished for it, by losing all the credit which his real ingenuity entitled him to. Notwithstanding this unfortunate declension, the mechanical shoemaker continued to indulge in his favourite pursuits. He turned his attention, among other things, to the construction of velocipedes, or horse-like machines, where the rider fulfils the double part of horse and horseman. On a machine of this order, consisting of two wheels, one behind and one before, with an intermediate bar, shaped like a saddle, in the centre, Spence once travelled between Edinburgh and Glasgow. He propelled himself by pushing his feet occasionally against the ground, and could keep up for a mile or two with a gig, going at a common pace. Although an unpractised person, from the narrow base presented by the wheels, could with difficulty balance himself on this machine even in a seated posture, Spence had acquired by practice such dexterity in managing it, that he could stand on the saddle on one foot, and with the other projected in the air as a balance, guide the engine down a declivity of nearly a mile in length, going all the while at a bounding pace. For some time he contrived to draw a little money by shewing this velocipede, and teaching people to ride on it, in a court-yard which he rented for the purpose.

Another production of John Spence's ingenuity was a house—a wooden house, which he erected at Fountainbridge, a suburb on the south-west of the Scottish metropolis. This house was twelve feet square, and consisted of three floors, reckoning a cellar and garret under that denomination. Twelve posts or standards, each about four inches square, composed the solid supports of the building, and these were clad outside and inside with deals, forming the walls. The space between might be filled up with any loose stuffing to increase the warmth within. An excavation beneath formed a cellar. The roof was of wood, and a trap-stair led from the main floor to the garret. The materials of the house were bound together by long screw-bolts, where required. This house was perfectly portable. Spence took it down one morning, moved it on one cart for six miles, and had it up on the new site before night. He dwelt in it with his family for two years, and here one of his children was born. His wife kept a sort of fruit-shop in it, and people used to come from far and near to see ‘the portable house.’ The whole cost of it amounted to little more than L.30. He sold it to a person in Fife, and, for aught known to the contrary, it now forms one of the respectable habitations of that ancient kingdom.

After various vicissitudes, John Spence settled down in Edinburgh in his old trade of a shoemaker, and the passion for mechanical invention remained till the last in as great force as ever, and, indeed, seemed only to have gathered strength with his increasing years. His attention, latterly, was directed chiefly to two objects. One of these was the invention of a reaping-machine; the other was the construction of skates for dry land: these last-mentioned machines were just skates, fixed upon little wheels, and they really answered the purpose wonderfully.

Such are a few of the works of this untutored lover of the mechanic arts. Spence appears to us to have been a man who would have unquestionably distinguished himself under more favourable circumstances. As it happened, the pursuits to which his mind turned itself were unfortunately incompatible with the steady prosecution of the labours upon which his bread depended. He was, in short, one of those men whose fortune it is, seemingly, never to find inclination and interest pulling one way. Take him all in all, he presented a remarkable instance of a character stamped with such indelible force by nature, or by early direction of his mind to a particular object, that no circumstances whatever have the slightest impression in eradicating the original lineaments.

ODE TO HOPE.

BY DR JOHN MASON GOOD.

O GENTLE Hope! whose lovely form
The plunging sea-boy, 'midst the storm,
Sees beckoning from the strand;
If yet thy smile can chase the sighs
From love and adverse fate which rise,
O view this lifted hand!

Through dire despair's tremendous shade,
Supported by thy secret aid,
The troubled spirit flies.
Thy sight sustains his drooping powers,
Thy finger points to brighter hours,
And clears the distant skies.

Then haste thee, Hope, and o'er my head,
While yet impervious tempests spread,
Obtrude thy magic form:
O give me, ere gay youth decline,
To view the fair Zelinda mine,
And I'll despise the storm.

LIFE:

ITS APPARENT LENGTH OR BREVITY.

LIFE appears long and tedious to the man who employs it ill—long and pleasant to him who employs it well. The pleasures of existence are indeed susceptible of extension, provided we apply ourselves diligently to the pursuits of knowledge. To some, a single day yields more true enjoyment and lasting gratification than is gained by others during a series of years spent in sensual indulgence. The good that may be done in even such a little space of time as half an hour, is only conceivable by those whose minds are energetic in well-doing. ‘There is a famous passage in the Alcoran,’ says Addison in the Spectator, ‘which looks as if Mohammed had been possessed of the notion we are now speaking of. It is there said, that the angel Gabriel took Mohammed out of his bed one morning to give him a sight of all things in the seven heavens, in paradise, and in hell, which the prophet took a distinct view of; and after having held 90,000 conferences with God, was brought back again to his bed. All this, says the Alcoran, was transacted in so small a space of time, that Mohammed at his return found his bed still warm; and took up an earthen pitcher—which was thrown down at the very instant that the angel Gabriel carried him away—before the water was all spilt. There is a very pretty story in the Turkish tales, which relates to this passage of that famous impostor, and bears some affinity to the subject we are now upon. A sultan of Egypt, who was an infidel, used to laugh at this circumstance in Mohammed’s life, as what was altogether impossible and absurd; but conversing one day with a great doctor in the law, who had the gift of working miracles, the doctor told him he would quickly convince him of the truth of this passage in the history of Mohammed, if he would consent to do what he would desire of him. Upon this, the sultan was directed to place himself by a huge tub of water, which he did accordingly; and as he stood by the tub amidst a circle of his great men, the holy man bade him plunge his head into the water, and draw it up again. The king accordingly thrust his head into the water, and at the same time found himself at the foot of a mountain on the sea-shore. The king immediately began to rage against his doctor for this piece of treachery and witchcraft; but at length, knowing it was in vain to be angry, he set himself to think on proper methods for getting a livelihood in this strange country. Accordingly, he applied himself to some people whom he saw at work in a neighbouring wood ; these people conducted him to a town that stood at a little distance from the wood, where, after some adventures, he married a woman of great beauty and fortune. He lived with this woman so long, that he had by her seven sons and seven daughters. He was afterwards reduced to great want, and forced to think of plying in the streets as a porter for his livelihood. One day, as he was walking alone by the sea-side, being seized with many melancholy reflections upon his former and his present state of life, which had raised a fit of devotion in him, he threw off his clothes with a design to wash himself, according to the custom of the Mohammedans, before he said his prayers. After his first plunge into the sea, he no sooner raised his head above the water, than he found himself standing by the side of the tub, with the great men of his court about him, and the holy man at his side. He immediately upbraided his teacher for having sent him on such a course of adventures, and betrayed him into so long a state of misery and servitude ; but was wonderfully surprised when he heard that the state he talked of was only a dream and delusion ; that he had not stirred from the place where he then stood ; and that he had only dipped his head into the water, and immediately taken it out again. The Mohammedan doctor took this occasion of instructing the sultan, that nothing was impossible with God ; and that He, with whom a thousand years are but as one day, can, if he pleases, make a single day, nay, a single moment, appear to any of his creatures as a thousand years.' Leaving the reader to smile at these fables, we shall only, by way of application, desire him to consider 'how different is the view of past life, in the man who has grown old in knowledge and wisdom, from that of him who has grown old in ignorance and folly ! The latter is like the owner of a barren country, that fills his eye with the prospect of naked hills and plains, which produce nothing either profitable or ornamental ; the other beholds a beautiful and spacious landscape, divided into delightful gardens, green meadows, fruitful fields,

INFANT CRIMINALS.

Of all the secrets of the prison-house, the most dreadful and appalling are those of which the prisoners themselves are the depositaries. It is not probable that the history of a man who has grown gray in the commission of crime and outrage against the law, will ever be truthfully written. Some idea, however, of what such a revelation would be, may be derived from the narratives of the young, who, nurtured in an atmosphere of dishonesty, and bold and hardened as they become in the practice of it, have not yet learned to lock up the past in impenetrable silence. The following few brief narratives, the personal experience of mere children, be it remembered, are given much as they fell from the lips of the narrators. The names only are fictitious, at least if the young criminals have spoken the truth, as, having no motive for using deception when making a voluntary confession, they may be supposed to have done.

David Cottle, aged fourteen, says: 'I've got no father; my father died when I was five year old. I got a step-father; I don't know as my mother is married. I am a Roman Catholic; so is my stepfather: he is a tailor. I can work at tailorin', but I never liked it, and used to run away from it whenever I could. When I got home, I got beat for runnin' away. Four year ago, I stayed out all night, and was took up along of four more for sleepin' in a iron tank. They said I was a vagabon', and gave me a month on it. I hadn't done nothin'. When I come out, mother beat me. I was in agin for two months more the year arter. I only took some victuals, because I didn't want to go home. When I was in the second time, I became acquainted with "Goosey."

Goosey was in for pickin' pockets, but it was never proved agin him, and he got off. He shewed me the trick, and I learned it well. When I come out, I never went home; I left the town, and went to a larger place. I lived with thieves, but I worked on my own account, and done very well before I got knowed. I was twelve year old afore I got into prison agin; 'twas for a hankecher. I got a whippin' and three months. The police began to look out for me now, and I got in agin the same year; but they couldn't prove nothin', and I only had a month. I began a new dodge now. I gave up workin' in the town, and went round to the country markets. I dressed well, like a young gentleman, and took as much as I wanted from the old farmers when I seen they got money, and where they put it. I got as much as forty pounds in a day in one place. At one time, I had as much as a hundred and thirty pounds, all my own earnin'. I got most on it from ladies. 'Tis easier, if you knows how, to pick a woman's pocket than a man's; besides, you can get off if they catches you at it. When I got notes, I knowed what to do with 'em: I didn't get half their value—not near. When I went to a new place, I had a new name; so if I was took up, they wouldn't ha' knowed I'd a been in jail afore. I got took at ——, because I slipped and fell when I was a-cuttin' off. I was committed and tried at the Sessions: I had nine months' imprisonment and hard labour. I made up my mind then to have no more to do with it; but I forgot that when I come out I had nothin' else to turn to. What is a fellar to do? I knowed it would go hard with me if I was took agin, so I only worked at night, and took every care what I was about. I've wished a thousand times I'd never learned the trick, but when I see a chance, then I can't help tryin' it on. I kept out of harm's way pretty well for nigh a year, but I got a drop too much one night along of some pals, and then I cut an old gentleman's guard, and bolted with the watch; and arter a long chase, I was nabbed. 'Twas all clear enough on the trial, because the watch was found on me. I didn't throw it away, as I could ha' done ; the reason was, I made sure of gettin' clear off. I was sentenced to transportation for seven years. I don't think that many fellars as takes to pickin' pockets ever gives it up. There's a pleasure and a glory, like, in it, besides the temptation, which is very great. Then you must live.'

Samuel Riddle, aged fourteen, says : 'My father is a labourer; he works on the railway. We are of no religion. I can read and write a little. I never went to church that I can remember. I never learned any trade before I went to prison, where I learned shoe-making. Mother died when I was little. I have not lived with father since I was ten years old; we didn't agree together. I've lived in lodgings when I had money; sometimes I lived nowhere particular, sleeping about where I could. I don't know as I ever took anything when I didn't want it before I went to prison. I've been sent to prison ten times in all. I've had three months three times in one year. I have picked-pockets of course: the most I ever made that way in one day was five pounds. I consider for a boy like me a pound or a pound or two a day very good work. I have tried it on in a good many places, but I never come out in the swell line: I aint up to it. Some do very well at that, and go on for years, and never gets took; but you ought to be able to look like a gentleman, if you wear a gentleman's clothes —else you get suspected, and of course found out. I have been in prison on and off more than two years out of the last four. Father never come to see me when I was in, and I've kept out of his way when I was out. I don't want to see him: he's no good to me. I was tried last Sessions for taking a purse and money from a farmer. He swore I took it, and if I say I didn't, you won't believe me no more than the jury did. I was sentenced to seven years' transportation.'

Robert Dutton, aged thirteen, says : 'My father is a respectable man, and fills a respectable situation. My mother died many years ago. I've got a step-mother; she never used me well. I cut away from her when I was eleven years old. I never stole anything but victuals when I was at home. I used to be sent to church of a Sunday, but I never learned to read nor write. I was sent to prison as a rogue and vagabond soon after I left home. I had a month first time; after that, I had two months and a whipping. I've been in prison seven times, and whipped three times. Whipping is nothing when it's done. I got my living how I could. I never picked pockets much. I took anything that come to hand, mostly by night-time. I've had no lodgings for a year together: I could sleep very well in barns and sheds. I've took ducks and fowls sometimes when nothing better offered. I've done a good deal in the linen way off the drying-lines, and among the gentlemen's coats on the pegs in the passages; sometimes a work-box or a writing-desk out of a parlour-window—anything of that sort. I was tried last Sessions about some silver spoons off a gentleman's sideboard in the hall, and sentenced to transportation for seven years.'

Ned Bratton, aged thirteen, says: 'I don't recollect having a father; my mother is a washerwoman. She sent me sometimes to the Sunday school, but I didn't learn nothing; I can't read. I can get my own living; I can help myself out of any shop in the town to anything I want. This is the way I does it: I'm a little un, you see, and when I wears India-rubber shoes, a mouse couldn't hear me step. I crawls under the counter when there's nobody in the shop, and shoves the till out over my head, and puts it on the floor, and helps myself, and there I leaves it. It wants a plucky cove to come that dodge. I've done it twenty times, and was never nabbed at it once. I've been in prison five times for other things, and have been flogged three times. I've been tried for taking a copper-kettle, which I shouldn't have took at all if there had been any money in the man's till. The pleeceman see me a-bringing of it out. I am to be transported for seven years for a eighteenpenny kettle!'

Thomas Pike, aged fifteen, says: 'I have lived in London all my life. My father kept a shop, and bought anything

(that is, was a receiver of stolen goods.) He got transported for life about four years ago, along of some watch-cases he bought of a foreigner. My mother sold everything, and set off after him, and left me to do for myself. I couldn't keep on the shop without money, so I gave it up, and took to the bag-line. The bag-line is this here : you goes about in a clean apron and holland sleeves, with a tidy bag over your arm. You keeps your eye on a good shop, where there is plenty of trade a-goin' on—say Mr Sole's boot-shop : well, you sees a cove come out with a pair of boots, or may be two, and you follers him : he goes, mayhap, a mile or more, and then he knocks at a gentleman's door, and leaves a pair, or perhaps both of 'em. You marks him clear off the ground, and then you goes and knocks at the same door, and presents Mr Sole's compliments, and says he's sorry to give trouble, but he have sent the wrong boots ; will the servant have the goodness to give 'em to you, as you have got to take 'em to St John's Wood ? You gets the boots easy enough most times, and then you bags 'em, and walks off. Of course, it don't matter whether its boots, or a new coat, or anything else, so long as you gets it in the bag. The bag is very useful other ways. Suppose you goes out early in the morning into the outskirts, just when the maids is sweeping out the street-doors : they likes to gossip with one another, and leaves the doors open while they does it. You walks into the passage quite cool and respectable, and looks about : perhaps the breakfast is laid in the parlour, and of course you haves an eye to the spoons, or to anything else that's hanging up or lying about. If anybody comes when you are there, you asks to see Mr Johnson on particular business ; and you makes a polite bow when you are informed that he don't live there ; and then you ask if that aint Foxmoor Terrace, No. 11, when you knows well enough 'tis no sich place. There's very good pickings to be had of a morning that way. A good bagsman will do a deal of work, too, on the pavement at sundown, among the goods that the shopkeepers shoves out upon the stones. A regular old hand would bag a joint of meat before your eyes, and you shouldn't see it, if the gas wasn't lighted. If you look sharp, you can do well with a bag at the railway stations. You takes a big un, as draws up tight with a string ; you looks out for a chance in the dark and bustle of a night-train. You've got your bag labelled large with your own address, and you claps it over a good carpet-bag of somebody's, and ties it tight, and then you bothers the porter for your bag, and tips him a tizzy because you are in a hurry : he brings a light, and looks out for a blue bag with Mr Pike's address upon it, and hands it over to you, while the yokel what owns it is a-looking on. That dodge aint so good now as it used to be, because it have been rather overdone ; but very few people knows how 'tis managed. I've been in prison for one thing and another more than a dozen times, but nothing of any account. They can't prove anything against me now, and I shall get off for a month or two, do what they will.' This voluble worthy prophesied truly. Nothing was proved against him upon trial, and he is again at large, and in all probability engaged in stuffing his bag.

John Jenkins, aged twelve, says : 'I was born and brought up in Westminster. I've been on the town, one way or other, ever since I can remember. The first thing I can rek'lect is a-crying with cold in the streets along with a woman a-leading me and a lot more young uns, and a-singing psalms. She wasn't my mother : my mother worked in the river among the coal-barges, a picking up at low-water. If I had a father, I never knowed him. I never went to no school 'cept in prison. I can read now a little. When I got biggish, I wquldn't go out on the chant no more. They gives nothing for it but your wittles, and not much o' that ; so I cut it. Then mother said, I must get my own livin' ; she gave me very little but my lodgings. I used to sleep along of her. Sometimes she come home drunk and savage, and turned me out in the middle of the night ; so I left her, and went to live along wi' Brown Jem. Brown Jem gave me plenty of wittles and drink too, and a glass of gin at times, and shoes and stockings, and set me right, all dry and comfortable. I done the sneak for Brown Jem. This is how you does it : you sees when a shopkeeper goes into the parlour for his tea or supper, then Jem he stans with his back to the shop-door, a-lookin' on up and down the road, and you crawls in, and takes what's wanted, and creeps out agin under Jem's long-tailed coat, and you cuts away. If they comes arter you, you runs for it ; and when you turns a corner, you plants what you got, and Jem comes up arter the chase is done, and swags it. There aint no chase once in twenty times, and when there is, Brown Jem is first in the hunt, and puts 'em on the wrong scent. Jem had five boys altogether ; he wasn't the father of none on 'em, but he lodged 'em, and gave 'em what they wanted. "Doey" was one of Jem's boys ; he could run as fast as a dog. Sometimes when Doey was agreeable, we would do the snatch. 'Tis done in this way : I looks about among the shops, and finds out where there's plenty o' money in the till. When the shopkeeper goes into his tea, Doey slips in after him, reaches over, and grabs the till, and shoves it into a sack, and starts like the wind. We waits round the corner with a string stretched across the road. Doey runs over it, and when the shopman comes a-rushin' arter him, we tightens the string, and trips him up ; and arter that we picks him up, and takes pity on him ; and when he's much hurt, we axes him where he lives, and takes him home. There are many dodges I could tell. I've a laid snug in a shop under the window, along with the shutters, a whole arternoon afore now, and heerd the man count his money arter the customers was gone, and then I've took the lot, all but the coppers. I've been in prison seven times afore ; I've been whipped twice. I never sees nothin' of Jem when I'm in trouble ; I'm sure to find him somewheres when I gets out. I can do a little shoemakin' ; I learned it in prison. I don't mind work, but I don't like it much. I'm in now on a charge of shopliftin'. I shan't say nothin' about it. I don't know how long I shall get. They won't transport me, I reckon ; I aint old enough.'

Andrew Mills, aged nine, says : 'I was born in London ; I can't tell where. I've lived in fifty different places ; never more than a month or two at a time in one place. I've got a father and mother too. I can't read ; I never see father or mother read : they got no books. Big Bob reads the newspaper to father sometimes when he is at work : he reads about murders and hangin' of a man, and about the fightin' men in the ring. Father works at makin' shillins and half-crowns ; they are made out of tin stuff and pewter-pots. Big Bob brings the stuff, and melts it up together, and helps father when he's busy---that's most times of a Sunday. Father makes the shillins, and mother and me smashes 'em. We goes out together, and walks about the town all day ; mother carries stay-laces, and pincushions, and pins and needles, in a big basket ; she don't sell much of that---a little sometimes. She buys hare-skins and rabbit-skins, and gives a new shillin', and haves ninepence or tenpence in change, along of the skin. Whenever we sees a ooman behind a counter, I goes into the shop and buys something, and gives a shillin' or a half-crown, and haves the change. If they says it aint good, I says I'll fetch another, and then I goes away. Sometimes a man comes into the shop, and wants to know where I live, and how I come by the bad shillin', and perhaps he won't let me go ; and then mother comes in, in a hurry, and fetches me a slap in the head for stayin' on errands ; and blows up the shopkeeper for keepin' of me, and then she shoves me out ; and we go and try it on somewhere else. I has a penny for myself when I does well. I don't know what becomes of half the money as father makes. Big Bob takes most of it away in papers : there is a pound's worth in every paper. Sometimes we haves very bad luck, and don't pass more than two or three shillins in a day. Night-time is the best for it, when the markets is doin' a trade. Mother goes regular to two or three places, where they takes a lot ; but they gets it cheap, because they got to smash it theirselves. There's plenty of it about Wapping and Rotherhithe, and along the river side, I know. Mother and I done this for more than two years, in a many places besides London, all about for twenty miles round. I knows the names of some of the places—not all. We used to go at fair-times and on market-days to Greenwich, and Croydon, and to Barnet, and to Barking and Epping, and to Edgeware and Hampton Court, and lots of places. Mother got too well knowed: she's a big ooman. At last, the pleece dodged us home, and broke in upon us one night, and took father, and mother, and me, and the shillins and half-crowns, and the metal pot and the plaster, and all. Father and mother is to be transported over sea; I don't know what they'll do to me; they says as how I am to learn a trade. I should like working well enough if there aint too much on it. I've never been in prison afore. I've been took to the station-house many a time; but they let me go when they couldn't get nothin' out of me—I was so little.'

Harry Bird, aged thirteen, says: 'I'm a Roman Catholic; I never go to church or chapel. I can read tolerably well, and likes to read a funny book well enough. My father is an Irishman; he can talk Irish. He keeps a house (meaning a house of ill-fame.) I have worked in a mill for a year a'most ; but I give it up because I likes my liberty. They calls me a rogue and a vagabond for that. I've been in prison a dozen times a'most. What of that? I can't help it, if they will put me there. They takes me up, and claps me in jail, because other boys as I knows is found out a-pickin' of pockets, and I am found in their company. They never proved nothin' against me. If I choose to walk about the town of a night, or all night long, what odds is it to anybody? I can go in and out when I like. Let 'em prove a charge against me if they can. I'm in for a month; I've had months enough in my time. I shall be out in a little more than a week, and then I shall be a rogue and a vagabond again, I suppose, if I ha'n't lost the use of my limbs.'

This impudent young scoundrel, though only thirteen, is the presiding genius of a juvenile gang of marauders, most of whom he has seduced to the practice of dishonesty. He has the cunning of the maturest villain, and contrives never to be implicated in the execution of the plans which he concocts for his followers. He has been well trained to this delicate business by his own parents, who are known and experienced fences; and so well skilled in the management of their trade, as to have escaped all contact with the police for seven years together.

The above are a few of the infant voices which cry aloud from the silence of our prison-walls. What is the language which they speak? And what response does it demand? And who shall utter that response, and when?

THE LIFE AND POETRY OF KEATS.

JOHN KEATS was born, October 29, 1796, of humble parents, who resided in Moorfields, London. While a mere boy at a school in Enfield, he gave such token of the possession of poetical talents, as attracted the attention of his teachers, by whom he was encouraged to compose exercises in verse. At the age of fifteen, he was bound as an apprentice to a surgeon in the metropolis, and in this situation he continued to devote much of his attention to poetry; but it was not till he had completed his twentieth year, that any effort was made by himself or his friends to bring his productions before the world. About the close of the year 1816, a sonnet of his composition having been received into the Examiner newspaper, a friend of the young poet called upon the editor, Mr Leigh Hunt, with a few similar productions, to which the attention of that gentleman was respectfully invited, but without the disclosure of the author's name. According to Mr Hunt's own declaration, he had not been led by experience of such matters to expect much pleasure from the perusal of them; but his eye had not wandered over a dozen lines of the compositions now submitted to him, when he found reason to believe that their author was, in the highest sense of the word, a poet. In an article, accordingly, entitled 'Young Poets,' which appeared in the Examiner of the 1st of December 1816, John Keats was introduced in favourable terms to public notice, in conjunction with two individuals, one of whom at least has amply fulfilled the anticipations of the critic. From that time pieces by Mr Keats appeared occasionally in the Examiner, till, in May of the ensuing year, these and other poems, chiefly composed in his teens, were presented to the world in a volume bearing his name. About the same time, Mr Keats abandoned his profession, the duties of which had never been agreeable to him.

The volume was such as might have been expected from a mind so young and inexperienced, and which was intoxicated with the spirit of poetry, rather than possessed of its power. It was full of obscure gleamings of something fine, but at the same time replete with rhodomontade and errors in point of taste. Even the editor of the Examiner, who had been the first to speak favourably of Mr Keats's talents, and to exert himself to make them known, mingled, with the praise he bestowed on this volume, many censures and many warnings. Yet, with all its faults, it contained passages which every unprejudiced person of poetical feeling must have pronounced to be in the highest degree beautiful—such, for instance, as the following Aspiration after Poetry :—

'O Poesy! for thee I grasp my pen,
 That am not yet a glorious denizen
 Of thy wide heaven; yet, to my ardent prayer,
 Yield from thy sanctuary somé clear air,
 Smoothed for intoxication by the breath
 Of flowering bays, that I may die a death
 Of luxury, and my young spirit follow
 The morning sunbeams to the great Apollo
 Like a fresh sacrifice; or, if I can bear
 The o'erwhelming sweets, 'twill bring to me the fair
 Visions of all places: a bowery nook
 Will be elysium—an eternal book'

Whence I may copy many a lovely saying
 About the leaves and flowers—about the playing Of nymphs in woods and fountains ; and the shade
 Keeping a silence round a sleeping maid ;
 And many a verse from so strange influence
 That we must ever wonder how and whence
 It came. Also imaginings will hover Round my fireside, and haply there discover Vistas of solemn beauty, where I'd wander
 In happy silence, like the clear meander
 Through its lone vales ; and where I found a spot
 Of awfuller shade, or an enchanted grot,
 Or a green hill o'erspread with chequered dress
 Of flowers, and fearful from its loveliness,
 Write on my tablets all that was permitted,
 All that was for our human senses fitted.
 Then the events of this wide world I'd seize Like a strong giant, and my spirit tease
 Till at its shoulders it should proudly see Wings to find out an immortality !'

Having fully committed himself to a literary life, Mr Keats produced, in the ensuing year, another volume, entitled Endymion, a Poetic Romance, in which neither the faults nor the beauties of the former were in any degree diminished. The subject was the well-known classic fable of the loves of Endymion and the Moon. The characters and histories of the Greek mythology, and the fine poetry in which they have been embalmed by the ancients, had made a deep impression on this young poet, and he had pondered and dreamed upon them till they grew into a new being under his hands. To a mind so entranced and contemplative as his, the tale of Endymion naturally became something far beyond and above what it appears in the classic originals ; and the consequence was, a pouring forth of a long chain of dreamy and mystical, but most poetical imaginings upon the subject, the whole moulded into the form of a tale. It opens with the description of a procession, from which the following are extracts :—

' Now while the silent workings of the dawn
 Were busiest, into that self-same lawn,
 All suddenly, with joyful cries, there sped
 A troop of little children garlanded ;
 Who, gathering round the altar, seemed to pry Earnestly round as wishing to espy

Some folk of holiday: nor had they waited
 For many moments, ere their ears were sated
 With a faint breath of music, which even then Filled out its voice, and died away again.
 Within a little space again it gave Its airy swellings with a gentle wave
 To light-hung leaves, in smoothest echoes breaking Through copse-clad valleys—ere their death, o'er-taking
 The surgy murmurs of the lonely sea.

* * * * *

Leading the way young damsels danced along,
 Bearing the burden of a shepherd song;
 Each having a white wicker, overbrimmed
 With April's tender younglings; next, well-trimmed,
 A crowd of shepherds with as sunburnt looks
 As may be read of in Arcadian books;
 Such as sat listening round Apollo's pipe,
 When the great deity, for earth too ripe,
 Let his divinity o'erflowing die
 In music through the vales of Thessaly:
 Some idly trailed their sheep-hooks on the ground,
 And some kept up a shrilly mellow sound
 With ebon-tipp'd flutes; close after these,
 Now coming from beneath the forest trees,
 A venerable priest full soberly
 Begirt with ministering looks; alway his eye Steadfast upon the matted turf he kept,
 And after him his sacred vestments swept.'

In Endymion there are many detached lines and couplets of great beauty. He speaks of Zephyrus, the deity of the west wind, ‘Fondling the flower amid the sobbing rain.’

He describes Peona, the sister of Endymion, sitting beside him while he slept,

—— ‘as a willow keeps
 A patient watch over the stream that creeps Windingly by it.’

Endymion wanders

‘Through the green evening quiet in the sun,
 O'er many a heath and many a woodland dun;
 Through buried paths where sleepy twilight dreams
 The summer-time away.’

Of a drowned maiden, he says:

—— ‘Cold, O cold, indeed,
 Were her fair limbs, and like a common weed,
 The sea-swell took her hair.’

The beauties of this poem were perceived, beneath its extravagances, by many individuals of talent; but there were a few critics, of political professions opposed to those of Mr Keats's principal friends, who, for no other reason, apparently, than his having received friendship at such hands, undertook to denounce his poetical pretensions —a task which it was not difficult to perform, as his poetry contained a sufficient number of passages to convince any one not disposed to look further, that he was little better than a raver. No man who has entered the world since those dismal times, could well believe that the spirit of politics could so far blind men of education and talent to the natural sense of justice, as to allow them to compose the papers which appeared respecting Endymion, in the two chief periodical works of the party opposed to the friends of the author. 'Calm, settled, imperturbable, drivelling idiocy,' were the terms applied to a poem characterised, as has been allowed, by much extravagance, but which was only so in consequence, apparently, of the excess in which the author was gifted with the poetical spirit. He was also recommended to 'go back to the shop, back to plasters, pills, and ointment-boxes,' as being unfit to prosecute the higher calling of the Muse. The effect of these vituperations upon the mind of so young and sensitive a being was very severe, and is said to have evidently operated in increasing the consumptive symptoms which his constitution was already exhibiting. To stigmatise the vituperators would be now of little service; but let the fact be a warning to future writers. Between assaults which wound and murder the body, and unconscientious criticisms which torture and destroy the mind, where is the difference?

About two years after the publication of Endymion, and when far advanced in the disease of which he died, Keats published his last volume, entitled, Lamia, Isabella, the Eve of St Agnes, and other Poems. The second of these pieces is a tale on the groundwork of one in Boccaccio. It contains the following beautiful passage respecting the attachment of the hero and heroine, Lorenzo and Isabella :—

' With every morn their love grew tenderer, With every eve, deeper and deeper still ;
   He might not in house, field, or garden stir,
   But her full shape would all his seeing fill ;
   And his continual voice was pleasanter
   To her, than noise of trees or hidden rill ;
   Her lute-string gave an echo of his name,
   She spoilt her half-done broidery with the same ;

He knew whose gentle hand was at the latch,
   Before the door had given her to his eyes ;
   And from her chamber window he would catch
   Her beauty farther than the falcon spies ;
   And constant as her vespers, he would watch,
   Because her face was turned to the same skies ;
   And with sick longing all the night outwear,
   To hear her morning step upon the stair.'

In the Eve of St Agnes, there is one peculiarly beautiful picture—Madeline kneeling by moonlight, in a convent, beneath a window of stained glass—

' A casement high and triple-arched there was,
   All garlanded with carven imag'ries
   Of fruits, and flowers, and bunches of knot-grass,
   And diamonded with panes of quaint device
   Innumerable of stains and splendid dyes,
   As are the tiger-moth's deep damasked wings;
   And in the midst, 'mong thousand heraldries,
   And twilight saints and dim emblazonings,
   A shielded scutcheon blushed with blood of kings and queens.

Full on this casement shone the wintry moon,
   And threw warm gules on Madeline's fair breast,
   As down she knelt for Heaven's grace and boon ;
   Rose-bloom fell on her hands, together prest,
   And on her silver cross soft amethyst,
   And on her hair a glory like a saint :
   She seemed a splendid angel, newly drest,
   Save wings, for heaven :—Porphyro grew faint :
   She knelt, so pure a thing, so free from mortal taint.'

In an imperfect poem entitled Hyperion, which appeared in this volume, and related to the dethronement of Saturn by Jupiter, and the later gods taking the places of the early powers of heaven and earth, Mr Keats's genius rose to a height which we do not think has been surpassed, or even reached, by any modern poet. His singular imagination here carries the reader into the times of the dawning mythology of Greece, which he renders instinct with a life and nature quite of his own forming. All is huge, gloomy, and wonderful. The deposed Saturn is thus described :—

 Far sunken from the healthy breath of morn,
 Far from the fiery noon and eve’s one star,
 Sat gray-haired Saturn, quiet as a stone,
 Still as the silence round about his lair ;
 Forest on forest hung about his head
 Like cloud on cloud. No stir of air was there,
 Not so much life as on a summer day
 Robs not one light seed from the feathered grass,
 But where the dead leaf fell there did it rest.
 A stream went voiceless by, still deadened more
 By reason of his fallen divinity
 Spreading a shade. * * *
 Along the margin sand large footmarks went,
 No farther than to where his feet had strayed,
 And slept there since. Upon the sodden ground
 His old right hand lay nerveless, listless, dead, Unsceptred ; and his realmless eyes were closed,
 While his bowed head seemed listening to the earth,
 His ancient mother, for some comfort yet.’

There is also an ode to the Nightingale, full of sweet poetry, and touching in a most affecting manner on his own sad state. It is worthy of being given entire—

‘ My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
 My sense, as though of hemlock I had drunk,
 Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains
 One minute past, and Lethe-wards had sunk :
 ‘Tis not through envy of thy happy lot,
 But being too happy in thine happiness—
 That thou, light-wingèd Dryad of the trees,
 In some melodious plot
 Of beechen green, and shadows numberless, Singest of summer in full-throated ease.

O for a draught of vintage ! that hath been Cooled a long age in the deep-delvèd earth, Tasting of Flora and the country green,
 Dance, and Provençal song, and sunburnt mirth !

O for a beaker full of the warm south,
 Full of the true, the blushing Hippocrene,
 With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
 And purple-stained mouth ;
 That I might drink, and leave the world unseen,
 And with thee fade away into the forest dim :

Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget
 What thou among the leaves hast never known—
 The weariness, the fever, and the fret
 Here, where men sit and hear each other groan ;
 Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last gray hairs,
 Where youth grows pale, and spectre-thin, and dies ;
 Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
 And leaden-eyed despairs,
 Where beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,
 Or new love pine at them beyond to-morrow.

Away ! away ! for I will fly to thee,
 Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,
 But on the viewless wings of poesy,
 Though the dull brain perplexes and retards.
 Already with thee ! tender is the night,
 And haply the queen-moon is on her throne,
 Clustered around by all her starry fays ;
 But here there is no light,
 Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown,
 Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways.

I cannot see what flowers are at my feet,
 Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
 But, in embalmèd darkness, guess each sweet
 Wherewith the seasonable month endows
 The grass, the thicket, and the fruit-tree wild ;
 White hawthorn, and the pastoral eglantine ;
 Fast-fading violets covered up in leaves ;
 And mid-May's eldest child,
 The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
 The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves.

Darkling I listen ; and, for many a time
 I have been half in love with easeful death,
 Called him soft names in many a musèd rhyme,
 To take into the air my quiet breath ;
 Now more than ever seems it rich to die,
 To seize upon the midnight with no pain,
 While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
 In such an ecstasy !
 Still wouldest thou sing, and I have ears in vain—
 To thy high requiem become a sod.

Thou wast not born for death, immortal bird !
 No hungry generations tread thee down ;
 The voice I hear this passing night was heard
 In ancient days by emperor and clown :

Perchaps the self-same song that found a path
 Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
 She stood in tears amid the alien corn ;
 The same that oftentimes hath Charmed magic casements, opening on the foam
 Of perilous seas, in faëry lands forlorn.

Forlorn ! the very word is like a bell
 To toll me back from thee to my sole self !
 Adieu ! the fancy cannot cheat so well
 As she is famed to do, deceiving elf.
 Adieu ! adieu ! thy plaintive anthem fades
 Past the near meadows, over the still stream,
 Up the hill-side ; and now 'tis buried deep
 In the next valley-glades :
 Was it a vision, or a waking dream ?
 Fled is that music :—Do I wake or sleep ?'

Soon after the publication of his last volume, the Edinburgh Review noticed his works in such a candid and generous spirit as must have compensated, if anything could now have compensated, for the malignity of other critics, and arrested, if anything could now have arrested, his progress towards the tomb. While acknowledging the existence of faults, the reviewer spoke of his works as 'flushed all over with the rich lights of fancy, and so coloured and bestrown with the flowers of poetry, that, even while perplexed and bewildered in their labyrinths, it is impossible to resist the intoxication of their sweetness, or to shut our hearts to the enchantments they so lavishly present.' He added, with reference to the Endymion, which had been so abused elsewhere : 'We do not know any book which we would sooner employ as a test to ascertain whether any one had in him a native relish for poetry, and a genuine sensibility to its intrinsic charm.' While these praises were passing upon his writings, the young poet was on his way to Italy, in the hope of staying the progress of his malady. After his arrival in that country, he revived for a short time, but soon grew worse. A few weeks before his death, a gentleman sitting close by his bedside, spoke of an inscription to his memory. He expressed his dislike of the proposal—he wished that there should be no mention of his name or country; 'Or if any,' said he, 'let it be—Here lies the body of one whose name was writ in water.' He breathed his last on the 23d of February 1821, in the twenty-fifth year of his age.

According to his earliest literary friend and patron, 'Mr Keats had a very manly as well as delicate spirit. He was personally courageous in no ordinary degree, and had the usual superiority of genius to little arts and the love of money. His patrimony, which was inconsiderable, he freely used in part, and even risked altogether, to relieve the wants of others, and forward their views. He was handsome, with remarkably beautiful hair, curling in natural ringlets.'

THE MAMMOTH CAVE OF KENTUCKY.

THE great majority of the natural excavations or caverns found on the surface of the earth, have been formed by subterranean currents of water, which have enlarged original fissures, or carried away masses of soft clay or loose sand, that were interposed between layers of hard rock. The streams, or springs, that exist in almost every cavern of any great extent, tend strongly to corroborate this view. It is observable, also, that nearly all large caverns occur in limestone formations, through which water filtrates with ease, and where, of course, it is most likely to accumulate in such quantities as to require and force for itself a vent. The subsidence of rocks, or the upheavings of them by earthquakes or volcanic agency, may doubtless have originated some caverns, but the majority of them are unquestionably to be ascribed to the escape of infiltrated water in the manner alluded to.

The most remarkable cavern which has been discovered in any part of the world, is that called the Mammoth Cave, in Kentucky, North America. What the true proportions of this cave are, as far as regards the length to which it penetrates into the earth, is not yet ascertained ; for though it has been explored to the distance of between nine and ten miles, no boundary has been reached, in any one of its numerous windings. The mere extent of this excavation is sufficient to render it an object of interest ; but the Mammoth Cave is not deficient in attractions in other points also, inferior though it be to many other subterranean cavities in the variety of its productions, or in the beauty of its natural curiosities.

The Mammoth Cave was not discovered by the present inhabitants of the United Provinces of America, until the year 1816. In the district in which it exists, there are many other pits and caverns of lesser size, among the limestone formations of which that region is almost wholly composed. A deep pit leads to the mouth of the cave, which is 30 feet in width, and from 40 to 50 feet high, and which seems like some frightful chasm in nature, whose hideous yawn allures the adventurer to its interior, only to bury him in impenetrable darkness. After advancing 200 or 300 yards, however, the lofty arch of rock over the visitor's head gradually contracts on all sides, and for several paces it is necessary for a man to stoop, though oxen are admitted with facility. The passage again expands to a width of 50 feet, and about 20 in height, which proportions it retains for nearly a mile. As the visitor approaches this part of the cave, an extraordinary spectacle meets his eye, which will remind him of the fabled labours of the blacksmith-god Vulcan, in the centre of Mount Ætna. Twenty or thirty blacks are seen, engaged, with the aid of torches and fires, in the labours of the cave, which consist in the manufacturing of saltpetre—a substance yielded in abundance by the earth of which the floor is composed. The saltpetre is separated simply by steeping the earth in water, which dissolves the salt, and afterwards deposits it by evaporation. This part of the cave is called the First Hoppers, and an exploring party generally supply themselves here with a torch to each man, which is rendered absolutely necessary, by the strong current continually rushing from the cold cave to the warm atmospheric without, and frequently blowing out some of the lights. From the First to the Second Hoppers, where saltpetre is also manufactured, the distance is about a mile, and the cave is throughout nearly 60 feet high, and 40 in width. For almost the whole way between the entrance and the Second Hoppers, the loose limestone has been laid up into handsome walls on both sides, and a good hard road has been also made. Though a few torches cannot shew it to perfection, the arches are in general regular, and the walls perpendicular.

Before the Second Hoppers are reached, several passages of nearly equal size branch off from the one generally followed, but the most of these return after a circuit, and intersect or join the main line. Beyond the Second Hoppers, the main passage expands to a height and width never less than 60 feet, which continues with little variation as far as the spot called the Chief City—an immense area, eight acres in extent, and without one pillar to support the arch, which is entire over the whole. Nothing can be more sublimely grand than this vault, which mocks the proudest of human erections. The Chief City is six miles from the mouth of the cave, and nearly straight south from it, though the approach is very circuitous. Five lofty avenues lead from this great area, each from 60 to 100 feet in width, and from 40 to 80 feet high.

We shall use the words of a visitor to the Mammoth Cave, Mr Nahum Ward, in describing the rest of it. Having entered the Chief City, Mr Ward determined to explore the avenues leading from it, and he thus details the result:—‘The first which I traversed, after cutting arrows on the stones under our feet, pointing to the mouth of the cave (in fact, we did this at the entrance of every avenue, that we should not be at a loss for the way out, on our return), was one that led us in a southerly direction for more than two miles. We then left it, and took another that led us east, and then north, for more than two miles farther; and at last, in our windings, were

' We rested ourselves for a few minutes on some limestone slabs near the centre of this gloomy area; and, after having refreshed us, and trimmed our lamps, we took our departure a second time through an avenue almost north, and parallel with the avenue leading from the Chief City to the mouth of the cave, which we continued for upwards of two miles, when we entered the Second City. This is covered with one arch, nearly 200 feet high in the centre, and very similar to the First City, except in the number of avenues leading from it; this having but two. We passed through it, over a very considerable rise in the centre, and descended through an avenue which bore to the east about 300 rods, when we came upon a third area about 200 feet square, and 50 in height, which had a pure and delightful stream of water issuing from the side of the wall about 60 feet high, and which fell upon some broken stones, and was afterwards entirely lost to our view. After passing this beautiful sheet of water a few yards, we came to the end of this passage.

' We then returned about 100 yards, and entered a small avenue—over a considerable mass of stone—to our left, which carried us south, through an uncommonly black avenue, something more than a mile, when we ascended a very steep hill about 60 yards, which carried us within the walls of the Fourth City, which is not inferior to the second, having an arch that covers at least six acres. In this last avenue, the farther end of which must be four miles from the Chief City, and ten from the mouth of the cave, are upwards of twenty large piles of saltpetre-earth on one side of the avenue, and broken limestone heaped up on the other, evidently the work of human hands. I had expected from the course of my needle, that this avenue would have carried us round to the Chief City, but was sadly disappointed when I found the end, a few hundred yards from the Fourth

City, which caused us to retrace our steps; and not having been so particular in marking the entrances of the different avenues as I ought, we were very much bewildered, and once completely lost for fifteen or twenty minutes. At length, we found our way, and, weary and faint, entered the Chief City at ten at night. However, as much fatigued as I was, I determined to explore the cave as long as my lights held out. We now entered the fifth and last avenue from the Chief City, which carried us south - east about 900 yards, when we entered the Fifth City, whose arch covers upwards of four acres of level ground strewed with broken limestone. Firebeds of uncommon size, with brands of cane lying around them, are interspersed throughout this city. These firebeds, or fireplaces, are numerous in all the avenues of this extraordinary cave, though of less size, generally, than those now seen in the Fifth City. They prove beyond a doubt that this subterranean world was once inhabited by human beings, but at what period of time this was the case, it is impossible even to conjecture. Certain it is, that the Red Men, whom we are accustomed to call the aborigines of North America, knew nothing, in recent times at least, of these caves. Cane seems to have been the fuel employed in warming these subterranean hearths.

' We crossed over to the opposite side, and entered an avenue that carried us east about 250 rods: finding nothing interesting in this passage, we turned back, and crossed a massy pile of stone in the mouth of a large avenue, which I noticed, but a few yards from this last-mentioned city, as we came out of it. After some difficulty in passing over this mass of limestone, we entered a large avenue, whose walls were the most perfect of any I saw, running almost due south for 500 rods, very level and straight, with an elegant arch. When at the end of this avenue, and while I was sketching a plan of this cave, one of my guides, who had been some time groping among the broken stones, called out, requesting me to follow him. I gathered up my papers and compass ; and after giving my guide, who sat with me, orders to remain where he was until we returned, and, moreover, to keep his lamp in good order, I followed after the first, who had entered a vertical passage just large enough to admit his body. We continued stepping from one stone to another, until at last, after much difficulty from the smallness of the passage, which is about 10 feet in height, we entered on the side of a chamber at least 180 feet in circumference, and whose arch is about 150 feet high in the centre. After having marked arrows, pointing downwards, upon the slab-stones around the little passage through which we had ascended, we walked forward nearly to the centre of this area.

‘It was past midnight when I entered this chamber of eternal darkness, “where all things are hushed, and nature’s self lies dead.” I must acknowledge I felt a shivering horror at my situation, when I looked back upon the different avenues through which I had passed, since I entered the cave at eight in the morning. With the guide who was now with me, I took the only avenue leading from this chamber, and traversed it to the distance of a mile in a southern direction, when my lamps forbade my going farther, as they were nearly exhausted. The avenue, or passage, was as large as any that we had entered ; and how far we might have travelled, had our lights held out, is unknown.

‘It was nearly one o’clock when we descended “the passage of the chimney,” as it is called, to the guide whom I had left seated on the rocks. He was quite alarmed at our long absence, and was heard by us a long time before we reached the passage to descend to him, hallooing with all his might, fearing we had lost our track in the ruins above. We returned over piles of saltpetre-earth and firebeds, out of one avenue into another, until, at last, with great fatigue and a dim light, we entered the walls of the Chief City, where, for the last time, we trimmed our lamps, and entered the spacious avenue that carried us to the Second Hoppers. I found, when in this large chamber, many curiosities such as Glauber salts, Epsom salts, flint, yellow-ochre, spar of different kinds, and some petrifactions, which I brought out with me. We happily arrived at the mouth of the cave about three in the morning, nearly exhausted, and worn down with nineteen hours' continued fatigue.

'I have described to you scarcely one-half of the cave, as the avenues between the mouth of the cave and the Second Hoppers have not been named. There is a passage in the main avenue, about 60 rods from the entrance, like that of a trap-door: by sliding aside a large flat stone, you can descend 16 or 18 feet in a very narrow defile, where the passage comes upon a level, and winds about in such a manner as to pass under the main passage without having any communication with it, and at last opens into the main cave by two large passages just beyond the Second Hoppers. It is called Glauber Salt-room, from salts of that kind being found there; there is also the Sick-room, the Bat-room, and the Flint-room, all of which are large, and some of them very long. The last I shall mention is a very winding avenue, which branches off at the Second Hoppers, and runs west and south-west for more than two miles: this is called the Haunted Chamber, from the echo of the sound made in it. The arch of this avenue is very beautiful, incrusted with limestone, spar, and in many places the columns of spar are truly elegant, extending from the ceiling to the floor. I discovered in this avenue a very high dome, in or near the centre of the arch, apparently 50 feet high, hung with rich drapery, festooned in the most fanciful and romantic manner, for six or eight feet from the hangings, and in colours the most rich and brilliant.

'The columns of spar and the stalactites in this chamber are extremely romantic in their appearance, with the reflection of one or two lights. There is a chair formed of this spar, called Wilkins's arm-chair, which is very large, and stands in the centre of the avenue, and is encircled with many smaller ones. Columns of spar fluted, and studded with knobs of spar and stalactites, drapery of various colours superbly festooned, and hung in the most graceful manner, are shewn with the greatest brilliancy from the reflection of lamps. A part of the Haunted Chamber is directly over the Bat-room, which passes under the Haunted Chamber without having any connection with it. My guide led me into a very narrow defile on the left side of this chamber, and about 100 yards from Wilkins's arm-chair, over the side of a smooth limestone rock, 10 or 12 feet, which we passed with much precaution; for, had we slipped from our hold, we had gone "to that bourne whence no traveller returns," if I may judge from a cataract of water, whose dismal sound we heard at a considerable distance in this pit, and nearly under us. However, we crossed in safety, clinging fast to the wall, and winding down under the Haunted Chamber, and through a very narrow passage for thirty or forty yards, when our course was west, and the passage 20 or 30 feet in width, and from 10 to 18 high, for more than a mile. The air was pure and delightful in this as well as in other parts of the cave. At the further part of this avenue, we came upon a reservoir of water very clear and delightful to the taste, apparently having neither inlet nor outlet.

Within a few yards of this reservoir of water, on the right hand of the cave, there is an avenue, which leads to the north-west. We had entered it but about forty feet, when we came to several columns of the most brilliant spar, 60 or 70 feet in height, and almost perpendicular, which stand in basins of water, that comes trickling down their sides, then passes off silently from the basins, and enters the cavities of stone without being seen again. These columns of spar and the basins they rest in, for splendour and beauty, surpass every similar work of art I ever saw. We passed by these columns, and entered a small but beautiful chamber, whose walls were about twenty feet apart, and the arch not more than seven high, white as whitewash could have made it; the floor was level as far as I explored it, which was not a great distance, as I found many pit-holes in my path, that

' We returned by the beautiful pool of water which is called the Pool of Clitorius, after the Fons Clitorius of the classics, which was so pure and delightful to the taste, that, after drinking of it, a person had no longer a taste for wine. On our way back to the narrow defile, I had some difficulty in keeping my lights, for the bats were so numerous, and continually in our faces, that it was next to impossible to get along in safety. I brought this trouble on myself, by my own want of forethought ; for, as we were moving on, I noticed a large number of these bats hanging by their hind-legs to the arch, which was not above twelve inches higher than my head. I took my cane, and gave a sweep the whole length of it, when down they fell ; but soon, like so many imps, they tormented us till we reached the narrow defile, when they left us. We returned by Wilkins's arm-chair, and back to the Second Hoppers. I found a remarkable corpse or mummy at this place, whither it had been brought by Mr Wilkins, from another part of the cave, for preservation. It is a female, about six feet in height, and so perfectly dried as to weigh but twenty pounds when I found it. The hair on the back part of the head is rather short, and of a sandy hue ; the top of the head is bald, and the eyes sunk into the head ; the nose, or that part which is cartilaginous, is dried down to the bones of the face ; the lips are dried away, and discovered a fine set of teeth, white as ivory. The hands and feet are perfect, even to the nails, and very delicate, like those of a young person ; but the teeth are worn as much as a person's at the age of fifty. The preservation of this body, doubtless, is owing to the saltpetre abounding in the earth of the cave.

' She must have been some personage of high distinction, if we may judge from the order in which she was buried. Mr Wilkins informed me she was first found by some labourers, while digging for saltpetre earth, in a part of the cave about three miles from the entrance, buried eight feet deep between four limestone slabs, seated with the knees brought close to the body, which is erect; the hands clasped, and laid upon the stomach; the head upright. She was muffled up and covered with a number of garments made of a species of wild-hemp and the bark of a willow which formerly grew in Kentucky. The cloth is of a curious texture and fabric, made up in the form of blankets or winding-sheets, with very handsome borders. Bags of different sizes were found by her side, made of the same cloth, in which were deposited her jewels, beads, trinkets, and implements of industry: all which are very great curiosities, being different from anything of the Indian kind ever found in this country.

'Among the articles was a musical instrument, made of two pieces of cane, put together something like the double flageolet, and curiously interwoven with elegant feathers: she had likewise by her side a bowl of uncommon workmanship, and a Vandyke made of feathers, very beautiful.' These trinkets and garments, exhumed with the mummy, though curious, do not throw much light on the subject of the former inhabitants of the great cave which has been described. If not of an Indian fashion, as Mr Ward avers, neither do they indicate the woman to have belonged to a highly-civilised community. Probably the skull of the mummy, which is still in Mr Ward's possession, might point out, by its shape, the woman's race.

Much light, however, yet remains to be thrown on North American antiquities, and there is no spot, we think, more likely to assist in this, on further examination, than the Mammoth Cave.

EARLY LIFE OF A COTTAGER'S CHILD.

IN the Edinburgh Magazine for 1821-2, there appeared a series of articles, entitled 'A True and Authentic History of Ill Tam,' understood to be the real autobiography of an eccentric clergyman of the Church of Scotland, who rose to the dignity of a professor in one of our provincial universities. As the author and subject of the articles was the son of a widow-cottager in a remote and primitive part of Scotland, his narrative contains what we are disposed to think a very faithful and interesting picture of life in that lowly but respectable condition; while of its vivacity and drollery in many parts, there can, we believe, be no doubt. For these reasons, and because the articles, in their original form, are in few hands, we propose to revive a few passages under the above new title, which seems appropriate to the object we have in view—that of conveying a picture of the rise and progress of the child of a Scottish cottager.

'From the earliest period of my recollection, I was known by the designation of Ill Tam, by which, as it may be supposed, I was given to the practice of every species of waggish mischief. I can still distinctly recollect that, instead of being dissatisfied with my title, I was not a little proud of it; and I verily believe that my conduct then, and long afterwards, was considerably modified by my desire to act in consistency with the honourable appellation conferred upon me—namely, to be a worker of all manner of wagery, a contriver of all manner of plot, and a deviser, no matter at what expense, of all variety of fun. I was born and brought up amidst the solitude and the sublimity of mountain scenery. The clear stream ran past my feet at the cottage-door; the birds sang clearly and melodiously from an adjoining bank of wood; and the distant hill-side was covered over with flocks of white and nibbling sheep; but my earliest impressions, notwithstanding all these external attractions, were connected with the home-department; with that fireside around, and upon which, were nightly assembled, among other more rational inmates, the dog, the cat, and myself.

' My talent for mischief was originally called into action by the instincts of these animals; for whilst they stood opposite to each other, the one in the attitude of attack, and the other in that of resistance; whilst he looked to me for encouragement, and she sputtered out her defiance and contempt for us both, it was impossible not to take an interest in what was going on; and, to my shame be it spoken, I always sided with Rover against poor Puss.

' Among the most early impressions which I can now recall, are those of devotion. My mother, from the first twelve months of my existence my sole surviving parent, was indeed a Christian, in the original and best sense of the term. Her object seemed all along to be, to convey instruction, and induce habit, not so much by any direct advice, as by example. Instead of putting words into my mouth, at an early age, when I was totally incapable of comprehending their meaning, she taught me, by her own conduct, to reverence, and to worship, in heart, and in all sincerity, the great unseen source of safety and support, upon which all alike, old and young, weak and powerful, ultimately depend.

' Ere I was five years of age, by the assistance of two excellent old women, aunts of my mother, I was enabled to read, or rather to sing—for my style of modulation was somewhat betwixt the two—the fifth chapter of St Matthew's Gospel, and even to convert this premature acquisition into a source of emolument and vanity. The cottage where I lived stood upon the side of a retired road, by which some of the most respectable farmers were accustomed to pass every Sabbath to church; and it was my weekly practice to take my station upon a green bank, in front of our dwelling, and there, from an old brass-clasped Bible, in a most audible and arresting tone, to pour forth upon the Sabbath passengers the whole detail of the Beatitudes. "That's really a surprising elf," one would observe, tossing me at the same time a half-penny; whilst another would prophesy of my future eminence and attainments. I thus acquired a purse against the ensuing village fair, and was led to account myself a prodigy of learning. Prayers were said, or, in the more expressive language of the peasantry, the book was taken, every evening and morning in our little family household, consisting of two old women, my mother, and myself, and the privilege of reading "the chapter" devolved on me; an office of which I was not a little proud, and for the discharge of which, however, I was but moderately qualified. I still remember reading hanged for changed; thief-priest for chief-priest; and Galloway (the name of the neighbouring county) for Galilee.

'To this chapter regularly succeeded a family prayer, in which, without the smallest reference even in aim, much less in effect, to correctness, or propriety of expression, there occurred not only thoughts that breathed, but words that conveyed their breathings from heart to heart. Notwithstanding all my reverence, however, and respect for the exercise, in which we were so regularly engaged, my love of fun or of mischief often preponderated over every higher and more hallowed consideration. I remember once of pushing a live coal towards the shoeless soles of the person actually engaged in prayer, and of enjoying the jest amazingly, when the sudden rising took place, and even the cat and the dog awoke into fearful aspect and consternation! Whenever, according to the only index of the escape of time of which I was possessed—the drying, namely, of my wet stockings from the crook—the prayer seemed to have extended beyond a reasonable length, I had always a variety of shifts of this description at command whereby to accelerate the conclusion.

'In the absence of company better suited to my years, I was compelled to convert those aged persons, my aunts, as I was accustomed to call them, who tenanted the other end of the house, into a source of amusement, in order to pass away agreeably the long forenights of winter.

Children are very quick-sighted in the discovery of the weaknesses of those with whom they daily associate ; and it was from the superstitious apprehensions of these most kindly and religious inmates, that I contrived occasionally to extract entertainment. They were genuine specimens of the old world : they rose early—always, during winter, long before daylight ; they breakfasted by eight ; and after spending the day in spinning upon the “wee wheel,” or in providing fuel from an adjoining copsewood, they regularly hung on the supper-potatoes at eight in the evening, when family-exercise was made ; and by nine they were again snugly lodged beneath the blankets. The fire was placed at some distance from the gable-wall, and the “crook,” which of course behoved to be suspended directly over it, was attached in an upper and an undiscovered region of everlasting smoke, to a cross-beam, or rannel-tree, one end of which was inserted in the gable, and the other extended over a joist at a convenient distance. Under these circumstances, it was no very difficult matter to attach one end of a string, amidst the higher altitudes of smoke and obscurity, to the crook, and by passing it over a cross-beam above, to bring it down within my pull, where I sat at my evening mechanical or literary recreations.

‘ Previously to the suspension of my aunts’ supper-potatoes, fresh fuel was added to the fire, in such a situation as to act most effectually upon the pot—in other words, directly below it. But no sooner had the flame begun to ascend, than the mistake became visible. It was evident that the partner on whom had devolved the task of making the adjustment, had misplaced the fire. The pot hung suspended over cold air and empty space, whilst the fuel was wastefully and idly consumed. A change was immediately, amidst mutual recrimination and reproach, effected on the position of the fire ; but scarcely had this been done, when the pot was observed to return to its natural position, as if actuated by a spirit of contradiction, and by a determined resolution against boiling that evening. This could not fail to excite surprise, and even some measure of alarm ; but still it was possible that both might have misadjusted the business ; so a fresh arrangement was made, and with no better success ; the perverse potatoes still refusing to be boiled, and travelling it backwards and forwards with the most teasing and now mysterious and even alarming perversity. Suspicion fell, of course, upon me ; but it being ascertained by my mother, that in this instance, at least, an alibi could be distinctly made out in my favour, there was no other alternative, after mature deliberation and investigation, left, but that of infernal agency.

'I have no recollection of any amusement in which, during the earlier period of spring, I took greater delight, than in "muirburn." The mountains, which all around my native dwelling lifted their heads, and presented their shoulders to the cloudy and encircling influence of heaven, were closely habited, from top almost to bottom, in an ancient and venerable robe of brown and blooming heather. But the spirit of innovation, under the password improvement, had pervaded the valleys beneath ; and grappling with every obstacle, and triumphing in the mastery of difficulty and obstruction, she began gradually to ascend, and her pathway was marked by the lighted torch and smoking heath. There is something truly sublime in the aspect of mountain muirburn by night. The elevation not only renders the flame visible to a distance, tinging and flushing every object for miles around, but converts all the superincumbent atmospheric into one concave glare of red and flickering light, now narrowing and now extending its boundaries, as a volume of smoke or a current of air induces or dissipates obstruction. The flame advances in a curve, and, collecting all its strength and maddening fury into the centre, there it flashes, and crackles, and tears, and thunders along—emitting a mingled noise, resembling, from a distance, the violent rending of sail-cloth—sometimes giving out and throwing off scaly flashes, along the rapidly ascending smoke, and again falling back upon itself, and shortening its stretch, as if to recover breath and power after each exhausting exertion. The rolling, too, and convolving and jetting of the smoke upwards, is a fine sight, as, in tier above tier, and swell above swell, it shoots away, under the conducting breeze, into a far, and a wide, and a fleecy projection. On a nearer approach, dark and gigantic figures pass across the flames. Well do I recollect my running out, with a burning peat in one hand, and a handful of dry and withered heath in the other, dropping fire as I went along, and studding the whole hill-side with a long train of separate and distinct points of ignition. But the enjoyment I experienced, as the various points spread out into size and junction, and, like the closely marshalled column of an army, marched forward in one combined career of irresistible destruction; as again and again I penetrated behind the flame into the dark and choking smoke, or fairly dashed through the hottest of the flame—amounted to exquisite delight.

‘So soon, however, as, according to popular opinion, the “muirburn reek” has cankered the air, and the sun, after having frequently gone down with a red and angry aspect, has shrouded himself behind dark and showery clouds; so soon, in fact, as the season of incubation amongst the feathered tribes has commenced, this amusement behoves to give place to that of bird-nesting in all its fascinating varieties.

‘The mavis, tuning his woodland clarionet, and sunning his speckled breast on the topmost twig of the birch; the black-bird, whistling his réveille from the thorn, and then clucking off suddenly with tidings to his mate of approaching danger; the linnet’s little roundelay of harmony; the robin’s smart and awakening chirm; the goldfinch’s fully inflated throttle; the tiny wren’s jerking-jinking twitter; and the lark’s ascending, revolving, encircling, and suddenly suspended chorus in the cloud—all these indicate the season of love, and the proximity of a nest. There she sits in the very centre of that holly-bush; her eye revolving, as we cautiously and circumspectly encompass her retreat; and her smooth sloping back, erect head, and spread wings and tail, indicating a resolution to retain her position as long as possible. Now, however, the danger approaches—the outer branches of the bush are divided—a miscreant countenance is discovered amidst the leaves—and she is compelled, first, to stir gently; then to linger an instant upon the edge of the nest; and, latterly, to hop it reluctantly along to the farther extremity of the surrounding brushwood. The eggs are blue—'tis a black-bird; they are spotted white—'tis a mavis; they are marled—they are gray—they are yellow—they are dusky red—they are composition—they are green: 'tis a linty—a shilfa—a robin—a goldy—a yoldring. Here is a nest all lined with dried mud, hardened into a paste, impenetrable to the rain. This one, which is fixed upon the cleft of the oak, is covered all over with stone, raw, and lichen. This other, amidst the roots of the hazel, is lined with down, and feathered up to the very edge. That little nut-shell of accommodation, which hangs pendulous at the extremity of the birchen twig, is the matrimonial residence of little tomtit, which, secure from Ill Tam himself, swings in the breeze, and defies approach. Beneath this hollow brow, incumbent over the stream, are snugly lodged the wren's numerous progeny, in an abode which pays no window-tax. And, amidst that close and matted grass, the lark sits in her straw-built cup, exposed, from faithfulness of affection, to be crushed by every passing foot!

'There is a pernicious tendency in boys to tame, or rather to torture, the young of birds. From the little gaping linnets, that swallow fragments of worm at the hand, to the more robust and clamorous progeny of the gled, no species or variety of the feathered race is safe. The truth is, a favourite has no friends; and so soon as you take a young hawk or mavis under your patronage and protection, the whole chapter of accidents, the whole of inanimate as well as of animated nature, is up in arms against him. You have cruelly cut asunder the sympathies of kindred; you have reduced a sentient being to a dependence upon, which was formerly altogether independent of, your humanity, vigilance, and providence ; and you have sent adown the wind, in poignant and clamorous lamentation, these lately happy parents, who, in nursing and rearing their progeny, were obeying a wise and a benevolent arrangement of God. The flat-roofed turf-house, which you have erected for the accommodation of your more vigorous pet, is accidentally converted into a seat, and the helpless inmate is crushed to death in the ruins ; or it may be, that he chokes himself upon the wing of a frog, or gasps himself to death, in attempts to bolt large morsels of tough and waxy dough ; or, upon the almost incredible supposition of his surviving for a few months, he retains only a mutilated existence, being generally deprived of a wing, lame of a leg, and blind of an eye, all at the same time. His whole aspect is the most abject and pitiable possible. His plumage is torn, and besmeared with every variety of batter ; and the wicks of his bill appear as if fastened together with glue ; till at last, having happily fluttered, and screamed, and torn, and lived himself out of your good graces, he is either starved to death by neglect, or suffers the martyrdom, some Saturday afternoon, of St Stephen. Suppose, however, that a young black-bird, or linnet, is the favourite, and that out of a nest of five raw-throated gorlings, one, by some unusual chance, has survived the first three days of captivity ; still, under what inauspicious circumstances does the little downy, half-naked deformity exist ! All, indeed, is soft and comparatively comfortable around, above, and beneath him : like a Russian furred up against the winter, he is sunk to the chin in sheep's wool ; but in admitting his food, in gobbling his worms and his doughy lumps, an unfortunate communication is established betwixt his stomach and the materials of his abode ; the wool sticks and tangles in his gizzard, and he expires in convulsions. Or, grant that he survives to take possession of his newly-constructed cage, seeded drawers, and suspended glass of water, the cat thrusts in her claw betwixt the cage-bars, extracts, and devours him !

'The season, however, advances, and

"Gentle spring and 'lamb-time' bring

The lambs, which have long, with every demonstration of vivid enjoyment, pounced and tugged at their mothers' teats, are now to be speaned, and thus deprived, for the future, of that rich and nutritious supply which nature has so bountifully and wisely provided for their use. The step-dame providence of some frugal, managing gudewife interposes her cheese-and-butter claims betwixt them and their birthright. In the upper recess of a withdrawing glen, the weaned mourners are stationed, in perfect bewilderment of grief, passing this way and that, across and athwart, and listening to every variety of bleat from afar, and chasing and coursing each other in the fruitless hope of a maternal recognisance. In the meanwhile, the old ewes are collected from the height; they line, and stream from the hill, like tears coursing, in rapid and separate descent, the weather-beaten cheeks of age. They are impelled and driven from heath to spret, and thence to the green and freshening sward. In one of the sinuosities of a pure mountain stream, a stone enclosure, resembling, in intricacy and bewilderment of construction, the fabled walls of Troy, rises into view. This is the "pen," or fold, and stands now precisely where, and under what aspect and construction, it has stood for ages past. Behind the advancing flock, all is clamour, and motion, and exertion; the shepherd, waving his plaid from his arm, projecting, in a lateral direction, his staff, and ejecting, from time to time, jets and jerks of arousing, sheep-compelling voice. The herd-callan and Ill Tam skipping and glancing from side to side, as if playing betwixt alternating and opposite attractions. The gude-man himself "wouffing" and wearing, hurling out large fragments of inflated wrath and indistinct command, whilst tail after tail escapes, in bobbing and swirling speed, betwixt his legs, or immediately under his nose, to the hill. The shepherd curs walking up behind, talking incessantly on the top of their tongues, swinging, about their shaggy tails, or necking, with the utmost precision and ease, some stirring and bounding runaway. The milkmaids, with their petticoats carefully gathered down upon and strapped around their ankles, cogs in their hands, and the coronet hassock on their heads, laughing, and walloping, and flaunting on, making bad worse, and good no better, by premature mirth and ill-timed garrulity. So, so! now they are bughted; now the horny heads bristle all along through the wattlings; a sea of goggle, green, meaningless eyes, black faces and erect noses, extends from end to end, from side to side. The milkmaids, with the cogs jammed betwixt their knees, as if they were fixed in a smiddy vice, make a rearward advance upon the prisoners. The milky deluge pours audible and long.

'Tell me not of the hilarity which obtains at routs, balls, plays, or assemblies; give me a brace of stout, ruddy-visaged lads on the outside, and double that allowance of springy, gleesome milkmaids, on the inside of a sheep-bught at milking-time, and then we shall talk of real fun and convulsive merriment—of that attack and retort, which are made and returned, in perfect good-nature, yet in all the boisterous seeming of contested victory. This was an amusement in which I took great interest. To pin the maids' petticoats together, from behind, or to invest some of the most remote ewes with thistle or bur heads under the skirt, were everyday tricks. But to accomplish, by means of a splashy descent, rendered still more slippery by being frequently slid upon, the downfall of one of the cog-carriers, as she pursued her way, in unsuspecting glee and careless speed, homewards, was an achievement which not only required address in the execution, but implied some degree of danger in the aftercome.

'Summer, too, was a glorious season for bumbee-binks and wasp-nests, and butterfly pursuits. Nor did the earth only afford interest and amusement during this sunny season. I have stretched myself out supine, upon a green and sloping bank, and continued for hours of mid-day heat, looking at the clouds which floated by, and wondering, from time to time, as I saw them advance rapidly towards the sun, and then gradually melt and disappear, what could have become of them. The chirp of the grasshopper, the buzz of the fly, and the hum of the bee, would not unfrequently lull me into that delightful stupor, amidst which the feelings, borne on the wings of fancy, repair to flowery bowers and Arcadian streams — dwell in viewless intimacy with things unknown, and convert the scattered fragments of half-perceived realities into fairer and more fascinating forms than ever did modern kaleidoscope present to view.'

BORROW'S ADVENTURES IN SPAIN.

MR BORROW, the author of a well-known work on the Gipsies of Spain, has also published, under the somewhat quaint title quoted below,* a very remarkable work, abounding in the most vivid and picturesque descriptions of scenery, and sketches of strange and wild adventure. Of his personal history, he tells us little ; but the hints and allusions scattered throughout this and the former work, shew that, in various respects, it has been a very strange one—‘fuller of adventure than anything we are at all familiar with even in modern romance.’ It was in the character of an agent for the British and Foreign Bible Society that Mr Borrow visited Spain towards the close of the year 1835. He spent the greater part of five years in this service, partly in superintending the printing of a Spanish Bible at Madrid, partly in personally distributing copies of the sacred Scriptures in the provinces. His work does not assume the form of a regular narrative, but is rather a series of sketches descriptive of the scenes through which he passed, and of the persons and adventures encountered by him in the course of his missionary enterprises. We purpose giving, as far as the fragmentary character of the work will permit us, a connected view of his efforts to circulate the Bible in the Peninsula, and of the success which has attended his labours.

Mr Borrow landed at Lisbon about the middle of November 1835, and proceeded without delay to take measures for the circulation of the stock of Portuguese Bibles and Testaments which had been placed at his disposal. A part of his stock was put into the hands of the booksellers of Lisbon, and at the same time colporteurs were employed to hawk the books about the streets, receiving a certain profit on every copy they sold. As Mr Borrow's stay in Portugal was limited, he determined, before leaving the country, to establish depôts of Bibles in one or two of the provincial towns. With this view, he set out for Evora, the principal city of the province beyond the Tagus, and one of the most ancient in Portugal, and formerly the seat of a branch of the Inquisition. After a dangerous passage across the Tagus, in which he narrowly escaped drowning, he reached Aldea Gallega about seven o'clock in the evening, shivering with cold, and in a most deplorable plight; and having engaged with a person for mules to carry him to Evora, started next morning in company with the proprietor of the mules and his nephew. 'When we started, the moon was shining brightly, and the morning was piercingly cold. We soon entered on a sandy hollow way, emerging from which we passed by a strange-looking and large edifice, standing on a high, bleak sand-hill on our left. We were speedily overtaken by five or six men on horseback, riding at a rapid pace, each with a long gun slung at his saddle, the muzzle depending about two feet below the horse's belly. I inquired of the old man what was the reason of this warlike array. He answered, that the roads were very bad—meaning that they abounded with robbers—and that they went armed in this manner for their defence ; they soon turned off to the right towards Palmella. We reached a sandy plain studded with stunted pine ; the road was little more than a foot-path, and as we proceeded, the trees thickened, and became a wood, which extended for two leagues, with clear spaces at intervals, in which herds of cattle and sheep were feeding ; the bells attached to their necks were ringing lowly and monotonously. The sun was just beginning to shew itself ; but the morning was misty and dreary, which, together with the aspect of desolation which the country exhibited, had an unfavourable effect on my spirits. I got down and walked, entering into conversation with the old man. He seemed to have but one theme—"the robbers," and the atrocities they were in the habit of practising in the very spots we were passing. The tales he told were truly horrible, and to avoid them, I mounted again, and rode on considerably in front. In about an hour and a half we emerged from the forest, and entered upon a savage, wild, broken ground, covered with mato, or brushwood. The mules stopped to drink at a shallow pool, and on looking to the right, I saw a ruined wall. This, the guide informed me, was the remains of Vendas Velhas, or the Old Inn, formerly the haunt of the celebrated robber Sabocha. I dismounted, and went up to the place, and saw the vestiges of a fire and a broken bottle. The sons of plunder had been there very lately. I left a New Testament and some tracts amongst the ruins, and hastened away.'

The goat-herd of Monte Moro—the night-scene at Evora, where Mr Borrow had taken up his quarters in the midst of a motley company of smugglers of the border—the fugitive, frantic with terror at the idea that he had been pursued by witches, and wearing rosemary in his hat, to elude their malicious search—and the benighted horseman encountered on the return to the metropolis—are sketches worthy of especial notice, and strikingly illustrative of the author's graphic powers. At Evora, he found a book-seller willing to undertake the sale of the Bibles and Testaments, and to him he intrusted one-half of his stock, the other half he consigned to the secretary to the government at Evora, who, in conjunction with the governor, was endeavouring to establish a school in the vicinity, and who promised to use all his influence to make the knowledge of the Scriptures the basis of the education which the children were to receive. During the time of his sojourn at Evora, Mr Borrow paid a visit every day to a fountain where the muleteers and other people who visit the town are accustomed to water their horses, and entered into conversation with every one who halted at the fountain, upon matters relating to their eternal welfare. None of them, he tells us, had seen the Bible, and not more than half-a-dozen had the slightest inkling of what the holy book contained, but they listened with attention and apparent interest to the statements addressed to them. The belief in witchcraft is very prevalent among the peasantry of Portugal, and many of them wear charms, fabricated and sold by the monks for protection against witches and robbers. Mr Borrow, however, bears emphatic testimony to the decline of the influence of the monks both in Spain and Portugal. Even the smugglers whom he met in the inn at Evora spoke of priestcraft and the monkish system with the utmost abhorrence, and said that they should prefer death to submitting again to the yoke which had formerly galled their necks.

The following description of the manner in which a fidalgo found it necessary to travel on the simple occasion of a household removal, gives a striking picture of the insecurity of the traveller, and of the perils of a wayfaring life in the Peninsula:—‘ Had they been conveying the wealth of Ind through the deserts of Arabia, they could not have travelled with more precaution. The nephew, with drawn sabre, rode in front; pistols in his holsters, and the usual Spanish gun slung at his saddle. Behind him tramped six men in a rank, with muskets shouldered, and each of them wore at his girdle a hatchet, which was probably intended to cleave the thieves to the brisket should they venture to come to close-quarters. There were six vehicles, two of them calashes, in which latter rode the fidalgo and his daughters ; the others were covered carts, and seemed to be filled with household furniture : each of these vehicles had an armed rustic on either side ; and the son, a lad about sixteen, brought up the rear, with a squad equal to that of his cousin in the van. The soldiers, who by good-fortune were light horse, and admirably mounted, were galloping about in all directions, for the purpose of driving the enemy from cover, should they happen to be lurking in the neighbourhood.'

About a fortnight after his return from Evora, Mr Borrow set out for Madrid by way of Badajos. At Elvas, he encountered the oldest woman in Spain, who described the great earthquake as having happened within her recollection. Shortly after crossing the Spanish frontier, he fell in with those singular people, the Zincali, Gitanos, or Spanish gipsies. One of them, named Antonio, who is mentioned in his former work, offers to be his guide to Madrid. The hankering for gipsy society, and the desire to make himself acquainted with the ways of the Spanish gipsies, proved an irresistible temptation. Mr Borrow accepts the offer, and for more than a week we find him pursuing his way mounted on a spare pony from the gipsy camp, lodging as gipsies are wont to lodge, sometimes in field and forest, sometimes in town or village, and passing through some very queer scenes, in company with his gipsy guide. At Merida, they stayed three days in the house of an old gipsy crone, who astonished our author with wonderful tales of the Moors, prison escapes, thievish feats, and one or two poisoning adventures, in which she had been engaged in her early youth. The old lady became so much attached to Mr Borrow, as to offer him her grand-daughter in marriage, and resolutely to combat the excuses by which he sought to evade this tender proposition. After various other singular adventures, Antonio, who, for very excellent reasons, was afraid of being recognised in the towns through which they required to pass, found that he had no chance of escape, except in quitting the high road altogether. Mr Borrow, therefore, proceeds on his journey alone. But near Talavera, he overtakes another traveller, the tallest and bulkiest man he had hitherto seen in Spain, dressed in a manner strange and singular for the country. The stranger spoke good Castilian, but in the course of conversation, a word escaped him which betrayed the Moresco; and the subsequent communications which he made to Mr Borrow, bring to light some interesting facts respecting the condition of his race in Spain.

On reaching Madrid, Mr Borrow lost no time in taking steps to obtain permission from the government to print the New Testament in the Castilian language, for circulation in Spain. Having received from our minister, Mr Villiers (now Lord Clarendon), a letter of introduction to Mendizabal, who was at that time prime minister of Spain, he repaired to his office. ‘Several individuals were admitted before me; at last, however, my own turn came, and I was ushered into the presence of Mendizabal. He stood behind a table covered with papers, on which his eyes were intently fixed. He took not the slightest notice when I entered, and I had leisure enough to survey him. He was a huge athletic man, somewhat taller than myself, who measure six feet two without my shoes; his complexion was florid, his features fine and regular, his nose quite aquiline, and his teeth splendidly white; though scarcely fifty years of age, his hair was remarkably gray; he was dressed in a rich morning-gown, with a gold chain round his neck, and morocco slippers on his feet. His secretary, a fine intellectual-looking man, who, as I was subsequently informed, had acquired a name both in English and Spanish literature, stood at one end of the table with papers in his hands. After I had been standing about a quarter of an hour, Mendizabal suddenly lifted up a pair of sharp eyes, and fixed them upon me with a peculiarly scrutinising glance. My interview with him lasted nearly an hour. As I was going away, he said: “Yours is not the first application I have had. Ever since I have held the reins of government, I have been pestered in this manner by English, calling themselves evangelical Christians, who have of late come flocking over into Spain. What a strange infatuation is this, which drives you over lands and waters with Bibles in your hands ! My good sir, it is not Bibles we want, but rather guns and gunpowder, to put the rebels down with, and, above all, money, that we may pay the troops. Whenever you come with these three things, you shall have a hearty welcome ; if not, we really can dispense with your visits, however great the honour.” ’

A change of ministry having taken place shortly after this interview, Mr Borrow renewed his application, but found his designs thwarted by the secretary of the Duke of Rivas, an obstinate Aragonese, who had got an idea into his head on this subject which it was found impossible to dislodge. Galiano, minister of marine, gave Mr Borrow a letter of introduction to the duke, in whose department was vested the power of granting permission to print the Bible. The interview ended in the disappointment of our author ; and we next find him engaged in describing the revolution of the Granja and the death of Quesada, events which he has painted with a master-hand ; but we can only find room for an incident illustrative of the coolness and activity of English newspaper reporters. ““These men mean mischief,” said I to my friend D—— of the Morning Chronicle, “and depend upon it, that, if they are ordered, they will commence firing, caring nothing whom they hit.” . . . . Taking me by the arm, “Let us get,” said he, “out of this crowd, and mount to some window, where I can write down what is about to take place, for I agree with you that mischief is meant.” Just opposite the post-office was a large house, in the topmost storey of which we beheld a paper displayed, importing that apartments were to let ; whereupon we instantly ascended the common stair, and having agreed with the mistress of the house for the use of the front-room for the day, we bolted the door, and the reporter producing his note-book and pencil, prepared to take notes of the coming events, which were already casting their shadow before. What most extraordinary men are these reporters of newspapers in general—I mean English newspapers! Surely, if there be any class of individuals who are entitled to the appellation of cosmopolites, it is these. . . . The activity, energy, and courage which they occasionally display in the pursuit of information, are truly remarkable. I saw them during the three days at Paris, mingled with canaille and gamins behind the barriers, whilst the mitraille was flying in all directions, and the desperate cuirassiers were dashing their fierce horses against these seemingly feeble bulwarks. There stood they, dotting down their observations in their pocket-books, as unconcernedly as if reporting the proceedings of a reform meeting in Covent Garden or Finsbury Square; whilst in Spain, several of them accompanied the Carlist and Christino guerillas in some of their most desperate raids and expeditions, exposing themselves to the danger of hostile bullets, the inclemency of winter, and the fierce heat of the summer sun.'

Shortly after the revolution of La Granja, Mr Borrow returned to England, for the purpose of consulting with his friends, and for planning the opening of a Biblical campaign in Spain. He lost no time in returning to the scene of his labours, and, having landed at Cadiz, proceeded through Seville and Cordova to Madrid. He had received intimation from the proper Spanish minister, that though a formal licence could not be given to print the Bible, yet his operations would not be interfered with by the government; and acting upon this tacit permission, an edition of the New Testament, consisting of 5000 copies, was speedily published. As soon as this was accomplished, the indefatigable agent resolved to put into execution a plan on which he had mused off Cape Finisterre in the tempest, in the cut-throat passes of the Morena, and on the plains of La Mancha, as he jogged along with his smuggler guide. 'I had determined,' says he, 'after depositing a certain number of copies in the shops of the booksellers of Madrid, to ride forth, Testament in hand, and endeavour to circulate the Word of God amongst the Spaniards not only of the towns, but of the villages; amongst the children not only of the plains, but of the hills and mountains. I intended to visit Old Castile, and to traverse the whole of Galicia and the Asturias—to establish Scripture depôts in the principal towns, and to visit the people in secret and secluded spots—to talk to them of Christ, to explain to them the nature of His book, and to place that book in the hands of those whom I should deem capable of deriving benefit from it. I was aware that such a journey would be attended with considerable danger, and very possibly the fate of St Stephen might overtake me; but does the man deserve the name of a follower of Christ, who would shrink from danger of any kind in the cause of him whom he calls his Master?" Into the details of this journey, which occupied a considerable portion of the year 1837, our limits forbid us to enter. It abounds in strange and deeply-interesting adventures and hairbreadth escapes, not merely from the banditti, by whom the roads were infested, but especially from the partisans of Don Carlos, who were at that time ravaging the country with fire and sword. At Finisterre, Mr Borrow was mistaken for the redoubtable Don Carlos himself, or at the very least one of his partisans, and narrowly escaped being shot, by the orders of a stupid, ill-tempered alcaid. The results of the journey, however, were on the whole propitious, as regarded the great object which the missionary had in view. He succeeded in securing the friendly interest and co-operation of the booksellers of Salamanca, Leon, Compostella, and the other towns through which he passed, and, moreover, disposed of a considerable number of Testaments with his own hands to private individuals of the lower classes. On his return to Madrid, he took the bold step of establishing a shop for the sale of Testaments; and to call public attention to it, he resorted to the English practice of covering the sides of the streets with coloured placards, no doubt to the great surprise of the Spaniards; and, besides this, inserted an account of it in all the journals and periodicals. These proceedings, of course, caused a great sensation in Madrid, and excited no little indignation and alarm among the priests and their partisans; and their fury was so much increased by the publication of the Gospel in the Spanish, Gipsy, and Biscayan languages, that they procured from the governor a peremptory order prohibiting the further sale of the New Testament in Madrid. Mr Borrow was even threatened with assassination unless he would discontinue selling his 'Jewish books,' and shortly after, on some frivolous charge, was committed to prison. This last step, however, was taken in such an illegal manner, that the authorities were glad to release him, after making a humiliating apology for the violence to which he had been subjected. Mr Borrow's sketches of the prison and its robber inmates are among the most interesting portions of his work. Snow-white linen, it seems, constitutes the principal feature in the robber foppery of Spain. But it is only the higher classes among them—in other words, the most hardened and desperate villains—who can indulge in this luxury.

Various interesting incidents are mentioned by Mr Borrow, to shew the desire which the people manifested to obtain possession of the Scriptures. 'One night,' says he, 'as I was bathing myself and my horse in the Tagus, a knot of people gathered on the bank, crying: "Come out of the water, Englishman, and give us books; we have got our money in our hands." The poor creatures then held out their hands, filled with small copper coins of the value of a farthing; but, unfortunately, I had no Testaments to give them. Antonio, however, who was at a short distance, having exhibited one, it was instantly torn from his hands by the people, and a scuffle ensued to obtain possession of it. It very frequently occurred that the poor labourers in the neighbourhood, being eager to obtain Testaments, and having no money to offer us in exchange, brought various articles to our habitation as equivalents; for example, rabbits, fruit, and barley; and I made a point never to disappoint them, as such articles

A poor old schoolmaster expended all the money he possessed in purchasing a dozen Testaments for his scholars. 'An old peasant is reading in the portico. Eighty-four years have passed over his head, and he is almost entirely deaf; nevertheless, he is reading aloud the second of Matthew; three days since, he bespoke a Testament, but not being able to raise the money, he has not redeemed it till the present moment. He has just brought thirty farthings.' Our limited space prevents us from entering further into these enthusiastic proceedings. We regret to say that sudden illness compelled Mr Borrow to return to Madrid, and afterwards to visit England for change of scene and air. On the last day of the year 1838, Mr Borrow again visited Spain for the third time, and resumed his labours, with considerable success, among the villages to the east of Madrid; but he soon found that his proceedings had caused so much alarm amongst the heads of the clergy, that they had made a formal complaint to the government, who immediately sent orders to all the alcaldes of the villages in New Castile to seize the New Testament wherever it might be exposed for sale. Undiscouraged by this blow, Mr Borrow determined to change the scene of action, and abandoning the rural districts, to offer the sacred volume in Madrid from house to house. This plan he forthwith put into execution, and with such success, that, in less than fifteen days, nearly six hundred copies had been sold in the streets and alleys of the capital; and many of these books found their way into the best houses in Madrid. One of the most zealous agents in the propagation of the Bible was an ecclesiastic. He never walked out without carrying one beneath his gown, which he offered to the first person he met whom he thought likely to purchase. The circulation of these volumes has produced a powerful effect on the minds of the Spanish people; indeed, their influence is already beginning to be felt. Mr Borrow informs us that, in two churches of Madrid, the New Testament was regularly expounded every Sunday evening by the respective curates, to about twenty children who attended, and who were all provided with copies of the Scriptures. By the middle of April, Mr Borrow had sold as many Testaments as he thought Madrid would bear. Every copy of the Bible was by this time disposed of; and with the remaining copies of the Testament, he betook himself to Seville, where he succeeded in circulating about two hundred. Finding, however, that the authorities still continued to thwart his exertions, he determined to repair for a few months to the coast of Barbary, for the purpose of distributing copies of the Scriptures amongst the Christians whom he hoped to meet with there. He accordingly sailed from Cadiz to Gibraltar, and thence to Tangier, where his narrative abruptly terminates. The extracts we have given will enable our readers to form some idea of the nature of this work, which has been pronounced on high authority to be 'about the most extraordinary one that has appeared in our own, or, indeed, in any other language for a very long time past.' We have confined our notice of Mr Borrow's book almost entirely to the events connected with the main object which he had in view in visiting Spain; but some of his episodical narrations are among the most remarkable and interesting portions of the work.

COUNT LAVALETTE, in early life, was an attached friend of the Bourbon dynasty, but the exciting events of the Revolution having opened up to him the prospect of an ambitious career, he became one of the most intrepid soldiers and supporters of the French Republic. During the latter years of the reign of Napoleon, he held the chief place in the post establishment, from which he retired on the introduction of the Bourbons. He was now accused of having been an accomplice in the conspiracy which brought on the events which terminated in the battle of Waterloo, and, after two days' discussion, was condemned to death. Immured in prison, he endeavoured to avert his fate by a writ of error, but this, along with a petition for pardon presented by Madame Lavalette, was refused. ‘The day of his execution approached,’ says the writer of his memoirs; ‘the unfortunate man had no hope left; the turnkeys themselves trembled. On the eve of that last day, the Countess Lavalette entered his prison. She had put on a pelisse of merino, richly lined with fur, which she was accustomed to wear when she left a ball-room; in her reticule, she had a black silk gown. Coming up to her husband, she assured him, with a firm voice, that all was lost, and he had nothing more to hope than in a well-combined escape. She shewed him the woman’s attire, and proposed to him to disguise himself. Every precaution had been taken to secure his escape. A sedan-chair would receive him on his coming out of prison; a cabriolet waited for him on the Quay des Orferres—a devoted friend, a safe retreat, would answer any further objections. M. Lavalette listened to her without approving of so hazardous a plan—he was resigned to his fate, and refused to fly from it. “I know how to act my part in a tragedy,” he said, “but spare me the burlesque farce. I shall be apprehended in this ridiculous disguise, and they will perhaps expose me to the mockery of the mob! On the other hand, if I escape, you will remain a prey to the insolence of prison valets, and to the persecution of my enemies.” “If you die, I die: save your life to save mine!” The prisoner yielded to her urgent entreaties. “Now, put on the disguise,” she added; “it is time to go: no farewell—no tears—your hours are counted!” And when the toilet was finished, “Adieu,” she said. “Do not forget to stoop when you pass under the wickets, for fear the feathers of your bonnet should stick fast.” She then pulled the bell, and rushed behind a screen. The door opened—he passed, followed by an old servant of his wife, and leaning on his daughter's arm. When they arrived at the sedan-chair, the chairmen were not there. The soldiers of the guard-house had assembled to see Madame Lavalette, and looked on without moving! This was a fearful moment. The men arrived at last; the chair went off. A few minutes later, a cabriolet, drawn by a swift horse, rolled over the stones of the Pont Michel. This took place on the 23d of December. M. Lavalette remained concealed in Paris until the 10th of January. A singular favour of fortune gave him as a retreat the very roof under which lived one of his political enemies, equally powerful by his name, his station, and his wealth. From the garret floor which Lavalette inhabited, he heard persons crying in the streets the police ordinance which prescribed search after his person. The barriers were shut; the delivery of passports suspended; expresses bearing the description of his person were flying about on every side. In the chambers, in the court circles, the utmost consternation prevailed among those who were convinced that all was lost if M. Lavalette was not taken. Paris, however, rejoiced, while the police, falsely accused of connivance, burned with impatience to damp the public joy, and answer, by a feat worthy of its zeal, the complaints of the gilded drawing-rooms, and the reproaches that re-echoed from the tribune. In the midst of all these dangers, Count Lavalette lived, protected by a family to whom he was personally unknown, but whose courageous friendship helped him to bear the agonies of his concealment. His days passed on between agreeable conversation and diversified reading; a double-barrelled pistol hid under his pillow, like a talisman, secured to him some nightly rest. This lasted seventeen days. Finally, on the 9th of January 1816, at eight o'clock in the morning, he went on foot with a friend to Captain Hutchinson's lodgings; and next day, at the very hour when a gibbet was being put up on the Place de Grève for his execution in effigy, he set off, dressed in English regimentals, with Sir Robert Wilson, crossed the barriers in an open cabriolet, and proceeded to Mons. During this journey, M. Lavalette, who did not know one word of English, was forced to keep a handkerchief to his face, as if he had been suffering from a violent toothache, that he might not be under the necessity of speaking to the numerous English officers that stopped his guide on the road. Once, at Compeigne, having entered a public room in an inn, a travelling clerk of a trading-house told him the whole history of his escape from prison, accompanied by the most ridiculous circumstances, and adding between every sentence the words : " You may believe me, for I was in Paris at the time." Another time, near the frontiers, a captain of gendarmerie asked for their passports, and took them with him. M. Lavalette travelled under the name of Colonel Lossack. The captain came back a long while afterwards, saying that there was no colonel of that name in the English army. Sir Robert replied that he was talking nonsense ; that they were fools for staying so long ; and making a sign to the postilions, they set off at full speed. At Mons, his generous guide was to leave him. M. Lavalette, very deeply affected, pressed his hands while expressing his gratitude ; but Sir Robert, still maintaining his wonted gravity, smiled without replying. At last, after half an hour's silence, he turned to M. Lavalette, and said in the most serious manner possible : " Now, pray, my dear friend, why did you not like to be guillotined ?" M. Lavalette stared at him, surprised at such a question. " Yes," added Sir Robert ; " I have been told you solicited as a favour to be shot." " Because the condemned person is placed in a cart, his hands tied behind his back ; then he is bound to a plank, which is slipped under the axe." " Ah, I understand : you did not wish to have your throat cut like a calf." M. Lavalette crossed a part of Germany, and soon entered upon the hospitable soil of Bavaria. The king received him with great zeal, and protected him against the French ministry, who insisted on his being delivered up to them. The Duchess of St Leu offered him her house, and Prince Eugene lavished on him all the consolations of friendship.' In 1822, Lavalette was restored to his native country, by letters of pardon granted by Louis XVIII.

ST CUTHBERT'S BEADS.

THIS is the name given by the peasantry of Northumberland to certain small stony substances of curious form which are found on the beach at Holy Island. St Cuthbert was a bishop of Lindisfarn in the seventh century, and his memory was long held in the greatest veneration. His connection with the place where the substances are found, may be presumed to have been the cause of his name being associated with them. The peasantry believe that the 'beads' are made by St Cuthbert, notwithstanding the acknowledged fact of his having died twelve centuries ago. The story is, that he sits on a rock beside Lindisfarn, and, using another rock as an anvil, forges the beads, which he leaves on the shore to be picked up by his votaries. The legend is thus introduced into Marmion :—

' On a rock, by Lindisfarn,
St Cuthbert sits, and toils to frame
The sea-born beads that bear his name :
Such tales had Whitby's fishers told,
And said they might his shape behold,
    And hear his anvil sound ;
A deadened clang—a huge dim form,
Seen but, and heard, when gathering storm
    And night were closing round.'

It is scarcely necessary to remark, that the use made of beads in Catholic times as a means of reckoning out a tale of prayers, enters into the set of ideas in which the popular name originated. Probably, being round, with generally a hole in the centre, they were actually used in many instances as beads before the Reformation.

It is remarkable that, though the rustic account of their origin was not, of course, to be believed by the more intelligent part of the community, the actual character or natural history of these beads was totally unknown fifty years ago. The learned, by whom they were then known to exist in many places besides Holy Island, called them entrochi, or wheel-stones, but could give no rational account of them. A gentleman, describing the Holy Island specimens in a popular miscellany, so lately as 1792, is at a loss to say whether they grow after the manner of corals, or are petrifications, or the result of crystallisation. He states, that on the north-east side of the island there is a large tract of limestone rock, which contains a vast number of them embedded; and he asks, are they formed in the limestone rock?—a question which now sounds odd in the ears of a man of science, but was not then to be so regarded.

It has only been ascertained within the last few years what the entrochi, or St Cuthbert's beads, really are, and how they have been formed. They are simply vertebrae, so to speak, of a plant-like animal which lived at the bottoms of ancient seas. Of this animal, there were many species, to which the general name of Crinoideans is applied; but the family is now nearly extinct. The crinoideans were composed generally of a stalk, rooted to the bottom of the sea; a mass at the top of the stalk, resembling the head of a flower, but containing the mouth and stomach of the animal; and a multitude of long tentacula or fingers, which extended from the flower-like part, and floated about in search of prey, which, on catching, they conveyed to the mouth. Within the stalk there was an alimentary canal. The whole body was a collection of small bones or shelly masses, joined together by a muscular substance; and the effect of this structure was, that the stalk and tentacula easily yielded and moved about under the will of the animal or the impulse of the sea; only the basis of the stalk being fixed. The thin detached plates forming the vertebral column, or stalk—and which, as already mentioned, are called St Cuthbert's Beads—are placed above each other, like a pile of the bone-moulds used by tailors for the making of vest buttons; and their surfaces, where they adjoin to each other, are adapted in the nicest manner to each other. In some species, there is a larger plate of vertebra at short intervals. In one kind, the column, and, of course, the plates also, are five-cornered, for which reason, the name of Pentacrinites is given to that species. These animals, although we know them almost solely through the remains of them which are found embedded in rocks, have been classed in an order, comprehending several genera and many species; and several splendid books have been published respecting them. Each individual, says Dr Buckland, exhibits 'in every one of its many thousand component little bones, a mechanism which shews them all to have formed parts of a well-contrived and delicate mechanical instrument; every part acting in due connection with the rest, and all adjusted to each other with a view to the perfect performance of some peculiar function in the economy of each individual. The joints or little bones, of which the skeletons of all these animals were composed, resemble those of the star-fish. Their use, like that of the bony skeleton in vertebral animals, was to constitute the solid support of the whole body, to protect the viscera, and to form the foundation of a system of contractile fibres pervading the gelatinous integument with which all parts of the animal were invested.'

While the place assigned to crinoideans in the animal creation was extremely humble—merely a stationary post at the bottom of a sea, where they caught and gorged themselves with marine animalcules—they have been formed with an amazing degree of care, and exhibit a structure even more complicated and wonderful than that of many animals which act a more conspicuous part in the world. An enumeration of the bones in an individual of a particular species (Encriinites moniliformis, or lily-shaped encrinite) presents curious matter of reflection. First, there are ten arms, with six bones in each; then, proceeding from the ten arms are twenty fingers, each with forty little bones; then, branching from these, a great number of tentacula, or smaller fingers, each consisting of so many bones, as makes up the whole number to 26,680! Great as this number is, it is exceeded by that of the ossicles, or little bones of another species, the Briarean Pentacrinite, which amount to no less than 150,000. These animals seem to have had that power, resting in all creatures liable to much personal damage, of repairing any minor injury which might befall them. Many of the fragments found in a fossil state exhibit the marks of such repairs having been in progress, or completed.

The fragments of decayed encrinites must have formed vast accumulations at the bottoms of ancient seas, for immense beds of rock formed in that situation are composed mainly of this rubbish. Such are many of the limestone beds of the transition period, and the entrochal marbles which extend over such large tracts in Northern Europe and North America. The fragments are of all sizes—sometimes a piece of stalk of considerable length, or a whole flower-like part; sometimes only a short bit of the former, or a mass of detached vertebrae. Many a parlour chimney-piece, composed of that kind of marble, affords opportunities for studying the encrinite structure, without the necessity of stirring from the fireside. The fragments may there be seen in complete confusion, as they were originally deposited at the bottom of their native element, the saw of the marble-cutter having cut through some pieces lengthwise, some obliquely, and some directly across. But it must be allowed that these masses of ruins give but a poor idea of the complete animal, as it lived in its original stately form, rooted to the rock below, and throwing abroad its many filament-like fingers in search of prey.

It will now, then, be understood by the lovers of the marvellous, that what superstition has thought fit to term St Cuthbert's Beads, are the loose vertebral bones of an animal, petrified by long enclosure in fossil rocks, and now dislodged and rolling about like pebbles in the bed and on the shores of the ocean.

EFFECTS OF ATMOSPHERICAL INFLUENCES UPON THE MENTAL FACULTIES.

Not always actions shew the man : we find
 Who does a kindness is not therefore kind :
 Perhaps prosperity becalmed his breast ;
 Perhaps the wind just shifted from the east.
 POPE's Moral Essays.

THERE are some who deny that particular states of the weather have influence upon the sensations and powers of the mind, but for no other reason than that they never were sensible of anything of the kind in their own case. They do not advert to the possibility of persons of a different constitution from themselves being liable to influences of which they are insensible. Milton is stated by his nephew to have been most able and disposed to write between the autumnal and vernal equinox ; and this provokes a sneer from Johnson, who felt nothing of the kind ; though elsewhere, at a subsequent period, he was brought to acknowledge, that there might be differences amongst men in this respect. It is one of the few places where Boswell exceeds in wisdom the subject of his biography, when, in reply to a remark of Johnson on the silliness of those who believe their minds to be affected by meteorological causes, he exclaims : ‘ Alas, it is too certain that, where the frame has delicate fibres, and there is a fine sensibility, such influences of the air are irresistible ! ’ ‘ Our country,’ says Sir William Temple, ‘ must be confessed to be what a great physician called it—a region of spleen; which may arise a good deal from the great uncertainty and many sudden changes of our weather in all seasons of the year. And how much these affect the heads and hearts, especially of the finest temperaments, is hard to be believed by men whose thoughts are not turned to such speculations. This makes us unequal in our humours, inconstant in our passions, uncertain in our ends, and even in our desires.’ These, of course, are only opinions, not physiological proof; but, as proceeding from men of observation and experience, they are entitled to respect. That particular winds, states of the weather, seasons, and climates, do exercise some power over the minds of men in general, is not now generally denied, though perhaps some rather fanciful speculations have been indulged in on the subject.

It is a remarkable fact, that the nations living in the tropical and frigid zones have neither of them such energetic intellects, generally speaking, as those which reside in the temperate latitudes. Dr Copland says: ‘Countries situate between 45 degrees and 63 degrees of northern latitude are inhabited by the most robust and enduring of our species, in respect of both physical and intellectual powers. It may be stated, in general, of the northern temperate zone, that the inhabitants of its more southerly countries have made the earliest advances in civilisation, and that those of its middle and more northerly climates, have carried the useful sciences and arts to the highest perfection. Within the range of this zone, man presents the greatest variety of temperament, of constitution, and of mental endowment.’ He adds, that ‘climates which are the most variable as to both the commencement and the course of the different seasons, are, notwithstanding the many disadvantages imputed to them, the most favourable to the advancement of the various bodily and mental powers.’ Certainly, a remarkable contrast exists between the people of temperate and those of tropical and frigid climes. The intertropical nations are generally of an enervated or effeminate character, the easy conquest and the ready slaves of whatever energetic neighbour chooses to invade them; while the inhabitants of the arctic regions are, again, stunted in mind as well as body, as if the excessive cold literally froze the genial current of the soul. What furnishes strong proof of the operation of these causes, is the fact, that elevation of situation gives all the advantages of a medium latitude; hence, for one example out of many, the great difference between the timid children of the plain of the Ganges, and the energetic tribes which hold by the mountains of Mysore. Well might Milton speak of ‘the mountain nymph, sweet Liberty’—though that is a term that only can be applicable in climates not exceeding the medium temperature.

When we come to personal sensations, we readily see how this should be. Every one must have been conscious of the lassitude and indolence produced by an unusually hot summer day, especially when the air has been moist as well as hot. He easily imagines how little business he could get through in a year, how little advance he could make in study, and how useless a being he would become in general, if the same degree of heat and moisture were constantly, or all but constantly, maintained. On the other hand, all must be sensible of the obstruction which extreme cold gives to intellectual operations. In that state, the mind is absorbed in its own uneasy feelings, and the means of alleviating them ; there is no roaming abroad for pleasure or instruction ; the thoughts and sympathies are all alike confined to the narrow circle around the domestic hearth. Hence there can be no mental progress. Such a state of things, experienced in generation after generation, at length tells upon the organic structure of a people ; and behold, as an ultimate result, the puny forms, flat heads, and impoverished intellects of the Samoiedes, Laplanders, and other races of the colder latitudes.

The warmer of the temperate climates, though they probably operate to some extent against the development of the active powers of the intellect, may be allowed to have the effect of elevating the spirits and contributing essentially to the happiness of life. The inhabitants of southern Europe are less industrious, and, as a necessary consequence, poorer than those of the north ; but, to judge from external appearances, they pass more cheerful lives. The clear mild weather seems to give directly the happiness which the children of the north are obliged to seek through the circuitous route of a constant application to hard work. It serves them for everything besides a small modicum of the most ordinary necessities of life.

'There is,' says Lady Blessington, writing at Genoa, 'a peculiar lightness and elasticity in the air of this place, which begets a buoyancy of spirits even in us children of a colder clime. It is positive enjoyment to look out on the blue unclouded skies, and the not less blue waters, that are glistening beneath the sunbeams, which are at this moment shining as brightly as if it were June instead of April. Then the look of cheerfulness that each countenance wears is exhilarating. Climate, aided by the light yet nutritious food in general use in Italy, is productive of a disposition to be pleased, that robs the asperities of life of half their bitterness ; although it may indispose people to studious pursuits, or unfit them for laborious ones.'* This is conformable to what is stated on the same point by most travellers in the southern regions of Europe. The rule is only confirmed by occasional exceptions from the fine weather of these countries, to which we shall presently advert.

The influence of certain winds and states of the atmosphere upon the mind, are subjects of familiar remark. Every one is sensible of the exhilarating effects of a clear sunny sky accompanied by a dry light wind, and of the contrary effects of an overclouded sky or a rainy day. Probably, there are two kinds of consequences from states of the atmosphere. All are cheered by sunshine, and depressed by gloom, from a simple principle of the mind taking pleasure in what looks bright and cheerful, and being dejected by the sight of whatever is dull and dismal. Here it is merely a natural language in things which addresses us and produces the effect ; and this, we believe, is all that the great bulk of healthy persons in Britain are sensible of in respect of weather. The other class of effects only tells on certain delicate or enfeebled constitutions. In their case, it is not the mere external appearance of nature, but probably some positive virulent quality of the atmosphere which operates. The east wind, for example, seems to wither up their genial feelings, and elicit every particle of ill-nature in their constitution. While that reigns, they have no enjoyment in life, and will scarcely allow anybody else to have. There is certainly nothing to forbid our supposing that this wind, desiccated by its passage across the continent of Europe, possesses some character, though one not easy of detection, which renders it actually injurious to the nervous system of such persons. At the same time, its effects might perhaps be less felt by elderly and weakly persons, if they were to make an attempt to brave it, and for that purpose were to engage in active and cheerful exercise. To illustrate this, we shall relate a brief anecdote. The officers of a little garrison placed in Tynemouth Castle during the time of the last war, had scarcely any amusement but that of shooting rabbits on the neighbouring downs, and dining occasionally with a respectable old married officer, who resided permanently there as store-keeper. Whenever the old gentleman accompanied them on their sports, of which he was extremely fond, he invited them to dinner; so it became an important point to get him out with them. An east wind came, and the old gentleman detested east winds, during the prevalence of which nothing could induce him to leave his sofa. Within sight of that place of repose there was a weathercock, which he consulted every morning. ‘Ah, east wind still—hump—no going out to-day.’ The young officers tired dreadfully of this state of things, and, by way of remedying it, caused a boy to climb up to the weathercock during the night, and tie it with its point to the west. Up rose the old gentleman. ‘Ah, west wind at last; well, we’ll have some sport to-day.’ The young gentlemen were not long in making their appearance, when an excursion on the downs was of course agreed upon. ‘And you’ll dine with me, my lads.’ They bowed assent, and off went the party. The old gentleman never once remarked the east wind during the whole day, although he afterwards learned the trick which had been played with the weathercock, and was for the future more chary of his invitations.

In Italy, the moral effects of certain winds have been remarked from ancient times. Horace speaks of plumbus austus, alluding to the mind-oppressing character of what is now called the sirocco; and Celsus tells us of the horror-exciting effects of the Tramontana, or north wind of the same country. The sirocco is a south-east blast, charged with the heat of Africa, and deprived thereby of its natural moisture. It is nearly the same air which some ill-judging architects produce from hot iron-plates for the warming of public buildings, disregarding the fact, that moisture is an element of the air indispensable to health. All travellers speak of the depressing effects of the sirocco. Matthews, in his Diary of an Invalid, describes its consequences as 'that leaden oppressive dejection of spirits, which is the most intolerable of diseases.' The Italians themselves have a proverb about a stupid book : 'Era scritto in tempo del sirocco'—[It was written in the time of the sirocco.] In Spain, the same wind is experienced in a modified form, and is called the solano. The people of that country have a proverbial remark, that no animals except a pig and an Englishman are insensible to the solano; and they add, 'No rogar alguna gracia en tiempo de solano'—[Do not ask a favour in the time of the solano]; it being presumed that men are then too much out of humour to do any kindness to their neighbours.*

The irritability and ill-humours attributed to these winds, would seem to be much exceeded by those of the Viente Norte, or north wind of Buenos Ayres, which Mr Parish, in his work on that country, describes as amounting to little less in some men than a temporary derangement of their moral faculties. 'It is a common thing,' he says, 'to see men amongst the better class shut themselves up in their houses during its continuance, and lay aside all business till it has passed; whilst among the lower orders, it is a fact well-known to the police, that cases of quarrelling and bloodshed are infinitely more frequent during the north wind than at any other time. Not many years back, a man named Garcia was executed for murder. He was a person of some education, esteemed by those who knew him, and, in general, rather remarkable than otherwise for the civility and amenity of his manners: his countenance was open and handsome, and his disposition frank and generous; but when the north wind set in, he appeared to lose all command of himself; and such was his extreme irritability, that, during its continuance, he could hardly speak to any one in the street without quarrelling. In a conversation with my informant a few hours before his execution, he admitted that it was the third murder he had been guilty of, besides having been engaged in more than twenty fights with knives, in which he had both given and received many serious wounds; but, he observed, it was the north wind, not he, that shed all this blood. When he rose from his bed in the morning, he said he was at once aware of its accursed influence upon him; a dull headache first, and then a feeling of impatience at everything about him, would cause him to take umbrage even at the members of his own family on the most trivial occurrence. If he went about, his headache generally became worse; a heavy weight seemed to hang over his temples; he saw objects, as it were, through a cloud, and was hardly conscious where he went. He was fond of play, and if, in such a mood, a gambling-house was in his way, he seldom resisted the temptation; once there, any turn of ill-luck would so irritate him, that the chances were, he would insult some of the bystanders: those who knew him, perhaps, would bear with his ill-humours; but, if unhappily, he chanced to meet with a stranger disposed to resent his abuse, they seldom parted without blood-shed. Such was the account the wretched man gave of himself, and it was corroborated afterwards by his relations and friends; who added, that no sooner had the cause of his excitement passed away, than he would deplore his weakness, and never rested till he had sought out and made his peace with those whom he had offended.'

The susceptibility of Garcia, if we are to suppose it correctly described, obviously reaches a degree which is totally unknown in this country. It is by no means unlikely that there is a susceptibility of impressions of all kinds in the people of such climates as that of Buenos Ayres, far beyond any which we find exemplified in more cool latitudes. The passionate character of the people of the south of Europe is well known ; and that this depends in some measure on the operation of climate, may be not unreasonably inferred from certain facts in their natural history. Physicians remark that in Italy the doses of medicine given in England would be enormous and highly injurious. Narcotics, taken at Naples in smaller quantity than in England, operate with much more powerful effect. There is also in Italy a liability to strong nervous affections from simple and even agreeable odours, of which we see no trace in our temperate climate. Dr Harrison states,* that he has known flowers and perfumes in a chamber produce syncope in healthy persons. On this last point we have some interesting information in Sir James Clark's work on Climate. ‘The next circumstance,’ says he, ‘connected with the diseases of Rome, which deserves notice, is the peculiar sensibility of the nervous system of its inhabitants. This is evinced in a very particular manner, by the disposition to convulsive affections, and the singular sensitiveness of the Romans, especially the females, to perfumes. This peculiar susceptibility of the nervous system appears to be of recent origin. We learn from ancient authors, that the Roman matrons were fond of perfumes ; and, as this peculiarity is not mentioned by the Roman medical authors who have more recently written on the climate and diseases of Rome, there can be little doubt that it did not exist in their time. “But in our times,” says a modern Roman writer, “nervous affections, vulgarly termed tirature or convulsions, are extremely common, attacking females more particularly, but likewise delicate individuals of the other sex. So easily affected are such persons, that they cannot even bear the odour of the most pleasant flowers without suffering." It is to be remarked, that it is not disagreeable odours which produce such effects on the nervous system, but the more delicate, and, to northern nations, agreeable odours of flowers, also vegetable and other perfumes. Hysteric headaches and numerous nervous affections are produced by such odours. The Roman physicians cannot fix upon any other circumstance to which this malady can be fairly attributed, except the indolent manner of life of the Romans, which favours, especially in such a climate, the relaxation and sensibility of the system. Such was most likely the principal source of this idiosyncrasy, and this no doubt still tends to maintain it; while the morbid sensibility of the nervous system once acquired, is doubtless, in some degree, transmitted from parent to child. But though much may depend on the effeminate and indolent manner of living at Rome, the climate, I believe, has some specific effect in inducing this state of the nervous system. The habits of the Romans differ little, I think, from those of the inhabitants of the other large towns in Italy—for instance, Naples, Florence, Genoa, &c.—and yet this morbidly sensitive state of the nervous system does not exist by any means in the same degree in those places. Even a temporary residence of some duration at Rome produces a degree of the same morbid sensibility, and in cases where the Roman mode of living cannot be adduced as the cause. Something depends also, I believe, on the moral education, though it must not be forgotten that the sensibility of the nervous system in all warm climates is naturally more exalted than in the colder, and the influence of the passions far greater in producing and modifying bodily disease. This is particularly the case with the Romans; and, in tracing the chronic diseases of such of them as came within my observation, I was struck with the general reference of their origin to violent mental emotions.'

THE STOLEN PRESIDENT.

THE custom of stealing away voters, so as to balk the election of a particular member of parliament, and which was, until recent times, of no very rare occurrence, meets with a parallel in early periods of our history in the abduction of persons of considerable influence in the state or on the bench. An incident of this nature, illustrative of the former unsettled state of Scotland, may here be related for the amusement of our readers.

In the reign of Charles I., when the moss-trooping practices were not entirely discontinued, the tower of Gilnockie, in the parish of Cannobie, was occupied by William or Willie Armstrong, a lineal descendant of the famous John Armstrong of Gilnockie, executed by James V. The hereditary love of plunder had descended to this person with the family mansion; and upon some marauding party, he was seized and imprisoned in the tolbooth of Jedburgh. The Earl of Traquair, Lord High Treasurer, happening to visit Jedburgh, and knowing this border moss-trooper, inquired the cause of his confinement. Willie replied he was imprisoned for stealing two tethers (halters); but, upon being more closely interrogated, acknowledged there were two delicate colts at the end of them. The joke, such as it was, amused the earl, who exerted his interest, and succeeded in releasing Willie from bondage. Some time afterwards, a lawsuit of importance to Lord Traquair was to be decided in the Court of Session, and there was every reason to believe that the judgment would turn upon the voice of the presiding judge, who has a casting vote in case of an equal division among his brethren. The opinion of the president was unfavourable to Lord Traquair; and the point was, therefore, to keep him out of the way when the question should be tried. In this dilemma, the earl had recourse to Willie Armstrong, who at once offered his service to kidnap the president.

Upon due scrutiny, he found it was the judge's practice frequently to take the air on horseback on the sands of Leith without an attendant. In one of these excursions, Willie, who had long watched his opportunity, ventured to accost the president, and engage him in conversation. His address and language were so amusing, that he decoyed the president into an unfrequented and furzy common, called the Figgate Whins, where, riding suddenly up to him, he pulled him from his horse, muffled him in a large cloak which he had provided, and rode off with the luckless judge trussed up behind him. Will crossed the country with great expedition, by paths known only to persons of his description, and deposited his weary and terrified burden in an old castle in Annandale, called the Tower of Graham. The judge's horse being found, it was concluded he had thrown his rider into the sea ; his friends went into mourning, and a successor was appointed to his office. Meanwhile, the poor president spent a heavy time in the vault of the castle. He was imprisoned, and solitary ; received his food through an aperture in the wall, and never hearing the sound of a human voice, save when a shepherd called his dog by the name of Batty, and when a female domestic called upon Maudge, the cat. These, he concluded, were invocations of spirits, for he held himself to be in the dungeon of a sorcerer. At length, after three months had elapsed, the lawsuit was decided in favour of Lord Traquair, and Will was directed to set the president at liberty. Accordingly, he entered the vault at the dead of night, seized the president, muffled him once more into the cloak, without speaking a single word ; and using the same mode of transportation, conveyed him to Leith sands, and set down the astonished judge on the very spot where he had taken him up. The joy of his friends, and the less agreeable surprise of his successor, may be easily conceived, when he appeared in court to reclaim his office and honours. All embraced his own persuasion, that he had been spirited away by witchcraft ; nor could he himself be convinced of the contrary, until, many years afterwards, happening to travel in Annandale, his ears were saluted once more with the sounds of Maudge and Batty, the only notes which had solaced his long confinement. This led to a discovery of the whole story ; but in these disorderly times, it was only laughed at as a fair ruse de guerre. Wild and strange as this tradition may seem, there is little doubt of its foundation in fact. The judge upon whose person this extraordinary stratagem was practised, was Sir Alexander Gibson, Lord Durie, collector of the reports well known in the Scottish law under the title of Durie's Decisions. He was advanced to the station of an Ordinary Lord of Session, 10th July 1621, and died at his own house of Durie, July 1646.

A TALE OF THE PLAGUE IN EDINBURGH.

IN several parts of Scotland, such things are to be found as tales of the plague. Amidst so much human suffering as the events of a pestilence necessarily involved, it is of course to be supposed that occasionally circumstances would occur of a peculiarly disastrous and affecting description—that many loving hearts would be torn asunder, or laid side by side in the grave—many orphans left desolate, and patriarchs bereft of all their descendants—and that cases of so painful a sort as called forth greater compassion at the time, would be remembered after much of the ordinary details was generally forgotten. The celebrated story of Bessy Bell and Mary Gray is a case in point. So romantic, so mournful a tale, appealing as it does to every bosom, could not fail to be commemorated, even though it had been destitute of the great charm of locality. In the course of our researches, we have likewise picked up a few extraordinary circumstances connected with the last visit paid by the plague to Edinburgh, which, improbable as they may perhaps appear, we believe to be, to a certain extent, allied to truth, and shall now submit them to our readers.

When Edinburgh was afflicted, for the last time, with the pestilence, such was its effect upon the energies of the citizens, and so long was its continuance, that the grass grew on the principal street, and even at the Cross, though that Scottish Rialto was then perhaps the most crowded thoroughfare in Britain. Silence, more than that of the stilllest midnight, pervaded the streets during the day. The sunlight fell upon the quiet houses as it falls on a line of sombre and neglected tombstones in some sequestered church-yard — gilding, but not altering their desolate features. The area of the High Street, on being entered by a stranger, might have been contemplated with feelings similar to those with which Christian, in the Pilgrim's Progress, viewed the awful court-yard of Giant Despair ; for in that well-imagined scene, the very ground bore the marks of wildness and desolation ; every window around, like the loopholes of the dungeons in Doubting Castle, seemed to tell its tale of misery within ; and the whole seemed to lie prostrate and powerless under the dominion of an unseen demon, which fancy might have conceived as stalking around in a bodily form, leisurely dooming its subjects to successive execution.

When the pestilence was at its greatest height, a strange perplexity began, and not without reason, to take possession of the few physicians and nurses who attended the sick. It was customary for the distempered to die, or, as the rare case happened, to recover, on a particular day after having first exhibited symptoms of illness. This was an understood rule of the plague, which had never been known to fail. All at once it began to appear that a good many people, especially those who were left alone in their houses by the death or desertion of friends, died before the arrival of the critical day. In some of these cases, not only was the rule of the disease broken, but what vexed the physicians more, the powers of medicine seemed to have been set at defiance ; for several patients of distinction, who had been able to purchase good attendance, and were therefore considered as in less than ordinary danger, were found to have expired after taking salutary drugs, and being left with good hopes by their physicians. It almost seemed as if some new disease were beginning to ingraft itself upon the pestilence — a new feature rising upon its horrid aspect. Subtile and fatal as it formerly was, it was now inconceivably more so. It could formerly be calculated upon ; but it was now quite arbitrary and precarious. Medicine had lost its power over it. God, who created it in its first monstrous form, appeared to have endowed it with an additional sting, against which feeble mortality could present no competent shield. Physicians beheld its new ravages with surprise and despair ; and a deeper shade of horror was spread in consequence over the public mind.

As an air of more than natural mystery seemed to accompany this truly calamitous turn of affairs, it was of course to be expected, in that superstitious age, that many would attribute it to a more than natural cause. By the ministers, it was taken for an additional manifestation of God's wrath, and as such held forth in not a few pulpits, accompanied with all the due exhortations to a better life, which it was not unlikely would be attended with good effect among the thin congregations of haggard and terrified-scarecrows, who persisted in meeting regularly at places of worship. The learned puzzled themselves with conjectures as to its probable causes and cures ; while the common people gave way to the most wild and fanciful surmises, almost all of which were as far from the truth. The only popular observation worthy of any attention was, that the greater part of those who suffered from this new disease died during the night, and all of them while unattended.

Not many days after the alarm first arose, a poor woman arrested a physician in the street, and desired to confer with him a brief space. He at first shook her off, saying he was at present completely engaged, and could take no new patients. But when she informed him that she did not desire his attendance, and only wished to communicate something which might help to clear up the mystery of the late premature deaths, he stopped, and lent a patient ear. She told him, that, on the previous night, having occasion to leave her house, in order to visit a sick neighbour who lay upon a lonely death-bed in the second flat below her own garret, she took a lamp in her hand, that she might the better find her way down. As she descended the stair, which she described as a turnpike, or spiral one, she heard a low and inexpressibly doleful moan, as if proceeding from the house of her neighbour—such a moan, she said, as she had never heard proceed from any of the numerous death-beds it had been her lot to attend. She hastened faster down the stairs than her limbs were able to carry her, under the idea that her friend was undergoing some severe suffering, which she might be able to alleviate. Before, however, she had reached the first landing-place, a noise, as of footsteps, arose from the house of pain, and caused her to apprehend that all was not right in a house which she knew no one ever visited in that time of desolation but herself. She quickened her pace still more than before, and soon reached the landing-place at her neighbour's door. Something, as she expressed it, seeming to swoof down the stairs, like the noise of a full garment brushing the walls of a narrow passage, she drew in the lamp, and, looking down beyond it, saw what she conceived to be the dark drapery of the back of a tall human figure, loosely clad, moving, or rather gliding, out of sight, and in a moment gone. So uncertain was she at first of the reality of what she saw, that she believed it to be the shadow of the central pile of the stair gliding downwards as she brought round the light; but the state of matters in the inside of the house soon convinced her, to her horror, that it must have been something more dreadful and real—the unfortunate woman being dead; though as yet it was three days till the time when, according to the old rules of the disease, she might have lived or died. The physician heard this story with astonishment; by'

as it only informed his mind, which was not free from superstition, that the whole matter was becoming more and more mysterious, he drew no conclusions from it, but, simply observing, with a professional shake of the head, that all was not right in the town, went upon his way.

The old woman, who, of course, could not be expected to let so good a subject of gossip and wonderment lie idle in her mind, like the guinea kept by the Vicar of Wakefield's daughters, forthwith proceeded to dissipate it abroad among her neighbours, who soon—to follow out the idea of the coin—reduced it into still larger and coarser pieces, and paid it away, in that exaggerated form, to a wider circle of neighbours, by whom it was speedily dispersed in various shapes over the whole town. The popular mind, like the ear of a sick man, being then peculiarly sensitive, received the intelligence with a degree of alarm, such as the news of a lost battle has not always occasioned amongst the people ; and as the atmosphere is best calculated for the conveyance of sound during the time of frost, so did the air of the plague seem peculiarly well fitted for the propagation of this fearful report. The whole of the people were impressed, on hearing the story, with a feeling of undefined awe, mixed with horror. The back of a tall figure, in dark long clothes, seen but for a moment ! There was a picturesque indistinctness in the description, which left room for the imagination ; taken in conjunction, too, with the moan heard at first by the old woman on the stair, and the demise of the sick woman at the very time, it was truly startling. To add to the panic, a report arose next day, that the figure had been seen on the preceding evening, by different persons, flitting about various stairs and alleys, always in the shade, and disappearing immediately after being first perceived. An idea began to prevail that it was the image of Death—Death, who had thus come, in his impersonated form, to a city which seemed to have been placed so peculiarly under his dominion, in order to execute his office with the greater promptitude. It was thought—if so fantastic a dream may be assigned to the thinking faculty—that the grand destroyer, who in ordinary times is invisible, might perhaps have the power of rendering himself palpable to the sight in cases where he approached his victims, under circumstances of peculiar horror; and this wild imagination was the more fearful, inasmuch as it was supposed that, with the increase of the mortality, he would become more and more distinctly visible, till, perhaps, after having despatched all, he would burst forth in open triumph, and roam at large throughout a city of desolation.

It happened, on the second day after the rise of this popular fancy, that an armed ship, of a very singular construction, and manned by a crew of strangely foreign-looking men, entered Leith Harbour. It was a Barbary rover; but the crew shewed no intention of hostility to the town of Leith, though at the present pass it would have fallen an easy prey to their arms, being quite as much afflicted with the pestilence as its metropolitan neighbour. A detachment of the crew, comprising one who appeared to be the commander, immediately landed, and proceeded to Edinburgh, which they did not scruple to enter. They inquired for the provost, and, on being conducted to the presence of that dignitary, their chief disclosed their purpose in thus visiting Edinburgh, which was the useful one of supplying it in its present distress with a cargo of drugs, approved in the East for their efficacy against the plague, and a few men who could undertake to administer them properly to the sick. The provost heard this intelligence with overflowing eyes; for, besides the anxiety he felt about the welfare of the city, he was especially interested in the health of his daughter, an only child, who happened to be involved in the common calamity. The terms proposed by the Africans were somewhat exorbitant: they demanded to have half of the wealth of those whom they restored to health. But the provost told them that he believed many of the most wealthy citizens would be glad to employ them on these terms ; and, for his own part, he was willing to sacrifice anything he had, short of his salvation, for the benefit of his daughter. Assured of at least the safety of their persons and goods, the strangers drew from their ship a large quantity of medicines, and began that very evening to attend, as physicians, those who chose to call them in. The captain—a man in the prime of life, and remarkable amongst the rest for his superior dress and bearing—engaged himself to attend the provost's daughter, who had now nearly reached the crisis of the distemper, and hitherto had not been expected to survive.

The house of Sir John Smith, the provost of Edinburgh, in the year 1645, was situated in Cap and Feather Close, an alley occupying the site of the present North Bridge. The bottom of this alley being closed, there was no thoroughfare or egress towards the North Loch : but the provost's house possessed this convenience, being the tenement which closed the lower extremity, and having a back-door that opened upon an alley to the eastward—namely, Halkerston's Wynd.* This house was, at the time we speak of, crammed full of valuable goods, plate, &c. which had been deposited in the provost's hands by many of his afflicted fellow-citizens, under the impression that, if they survived, he was honest enough to restore them unimpaired, and, if otherwise, he was worthy to inherit them. His daughter, who had been seized before it was found possible to remove her from the town, lay in a little room at the back of the house, which, besides one door opening from the large staircase in the front, had also a more private entry communicating with the narrower and obsolete turnpike behind. At that time, little precaution was taken anywhere in Scotland about the locking of doors. To have the door simply closed, so that the fairies could not enter, was in general considered sufficient, as it is at the present day in many remote parts. In Edinburgh, during the time of the plague, the greatest indifference to security of this sort prevailed. In general, the doors were left unlocked from within, in order to admit the cleansers, or any charitable neighbour who might come to minister to the bedrid sick. This was not exactly the case in Sir John Smith's house; for the main door was scrupulously locked, with a view to the safety of the goods committed to his charge. Nevertheless, from neglect, or from want of apprehension, the posterior entrance was afterwards found to have been not so well secured.

* This miserable place possesses an interest of which the most of our readers cannot be aware. It receives its name from the circumstance of a brave young man, by name David Halkerston, the brother of the ancestor of the celebrated Hackstoun of Rathillet, having been killed in it in 1544, when defending the town against the English under the Earl of Hertford.

The Barbary physician had administered a potion to his patient soon after his admission into the house. He knew that symptoms either favourable or unfavourable would speedily appear, and he therefore resolved to remain in the room, in order to watch the result. About midnight, as he sat in a remote corner of the room, looking towards the bed upon which his charge was extended, while a small lamp burned upon a low table between, he was suddenly surprised to observe something like a dark cloud, unaccompanied by any noise, interpose itself slowly and gradually between his eyes and the bed. He at first thought that he was deceived—that he was beginning to fall asleep—or that the strange appearance was occasioned by some peculiarity of the light, which, being placed almost directly between him and the bed, caused him to see the latter object very indistinctly. He was soon undeceived by hearing a noise—the slightest possible—and perceiving something like motion in the ill-defined lineaments of the apparition. Gracious Heaven! thought he, can this be the Angel of Death hovering over his victim, preparing to strike the mortal blow, and ready to receive the departing soul into the inconceivable recesses of its awful form? It almost appeared as if the cloud stooped over the bed for the performance of this task. Presently, the patient uttered a half-suppressed sigh, and then altogether ceased the regular respirations, which had hitherto been monotonous and audible throughout the room. The awe-struck attendant could contain himself no longer, but permitted a sort of cry to escape him, and started to his feet. The cloud instantly, as it were, rose from its inclined posture over the bed, turned hastily round, and, in a moment contracting itself into a human shape, glided softly but hastily from the apartment. Ha ! thought the African, I have known such personages as this in Aleppo. These angels of death are sometimes found to be mortals themselves: I shall pursue and try. He therefore quickly followed the phantom through the private door by which it had escaped, not forgetting to seize his semicircular sword in passing the table where it lay. The stair was dark and steep, but he kept his feet till he reached the bottom. Casting, then, a hasty glance around him, he perceived a shadow vanish from the moonlit ground, at an angle of the house, and instantly started forward in the pursuit. He soon found himself in the open wynd above mentioned, along which he supposed the mysterious object to have gone. All here was dark: but being certain of the course adopted by the pursued party, he did not hesitate a moment in plunging headlong down its steep profundity. He was confirmed in his purpose by immediately afterwards observing, at some distance in advance, a small jet of moonlight, proceeding from a side alley, obscured for a second by what he conceived to be the transit of a large dark object. This he soon also reached, and finding that his own person caused a similar obscurity, he was confirmed in his conjecture that the apparition bore a substantial form. Still forward and downward he boldly rushed, till, reaching an open area at the bottom, part of which was lighted by the moon, he plainly saw, at the distance of about thirty yards in advance of him, the figure as of a tall man, loosely enveloped in a prodigious cloak, gliding along the ground, and apparently making for a small bridge, which at this particular place crossed the drain of the North Loch, and served as a communication with the village called Mutries Hill. He made directly for the fugitive, thinking to overtake him almost before he could reach the bridge. But what was his surprise, when, in a moment, the flying object vanished from his sight, as if it had sunk into the ground, and left him alone and objectless in his headlong pursuit. It was possible that it had fallen into some concealed well or pit, but this he was never able to discover. Bewildered and confused, he at length returned to the provost's house, and re-entered the apartment of the sick maiden. To his delight and astonishment, he found her already in a state of visible convalescence, with a gradually deepening glow of health diffusing itself over her cheek. Whether his courage and fidelity had been the means of scaring away the evil demon, it is impossible to say ; but certain it is, that the ravages of the plague began soon afterwards to decline in Edinburgh, and at length died away altogether.

The conclusion of this singular traditionary story bears, that the provost's daughter, being completely restored to health, was married to the foreigner who had saved her life. This seems to have been the result of an affection which they had conceived for each other during the period of her convalescence. The African, becoming joint-heir with his wife of the provost's vast property, abandoned his former piratical life ; became, it is said, a douce Presbyterian ; and settled down for the remainder of his days in Edinburgh. The match turned out exceedingly well ; and it is even said that the foreigner became so assimilated with the people of Edinburgh, to whom he had proved so memorable a benefactor, that he held at one time an office of considerable civic dignity and importance. Certain it is, that he built for his residence a magnificent land near the head of the Canongate, upon the front of which he caused to be erected a statue of the emperor of Barbary, in testimony of the respect he still cherished for his native country ; and this memorial yet remains in its original niche, as a subsidiary proof of the verity of the above relation.

V I C T I M S.

VICTIMS are persons who have dropped out of the ranks of society, and become a prey to fortune. There are tasks which philosophers apply to, less worthy of them than might be an inquiry into the various causes which degrade men from their place in society. Some are vicious and imprudent, which of course are causes of very direct operation; but there is also an immense number whose decline is strictly the effect of that for which they cannot be blamed — want of the intellect and courage necessary for the place to which they were born. A certain quality, called by the common world softness, but which a metaphysician would trace to weak judgment, excessive kindness of disposition, and want of ambition and self-love, brings about a great number of bankruptcies in the mercantile world, and causes many a youth to forfeit commissions and appointments obtained for him by friends, even where there has been little to find fault with in the moral life. We must remember that this is a very artificial kind of world which prevails now-a-days: every individual is not to be expected to be suitable for a system. In the pastoral stage, all can make a certain livelihood, for all can tend sheep and cattle; but all are not calculated to adapt themselves to the many nice requirements of a mechanical era, such as is now passing. Hence victims are in some measure an unavoidable result of our social condition. The men, baffled in one thing, might go a step lower and try another; but we very well know that all men cannot do so, however much they ought.

There is, nevertheless, generally an element of bad conduct in the lives of victims. If their first decline is not the result of any such cause, they are sure to go wrong in some way before they are allowed by friends to attain the ripeness of the character. And for such errant behaviour there is usually but too much temptation or stimulus in the unpleasant circumstances in which they are placed. Friends, too, perhaps, are not always sufficiently forbearing. It is, unluckily, so very easy to pick holes in the doublets of unfortunate men. A rejected advice is enough to set off a rich uncle any day. Others, it must be owned, are more lenient, and stick longer. Still, one way or another, men out of suits with fortune are extremely apt to be thrown off the right balance. And it is only then that victimhood commences, or can commence. So long as there is self-respect, it may be considered as almost impossible. This recalls to mind that married men are far less liable to victimisation than single. The wife is a conservative being. A family system goes on by its greater weight, where a bachelor's establishment stands still. There is more to struggle for against misfortune, and considerations of wife and small children bring many well-wishers and supporters. Ergo, a married man must be a considerably worse man before he victimises than a single one needs to be.

After the first decided step towards disrespectability, the incipient victim may for some time keep up appearances in a small degree. He may venture to appear on the principal thoroughfares in the evening, or in a crowd going to church; and if you meet him, he shakes you off a remarkably good-humoured nod from one side of his head, as if there had been nothing the matter with him. But by and by, this last shred of privilege leaves him, and he becomes condemned to the back streets and the shabbiest parts of the town. He is now found wearing white hats when all other people are wearing black ones, indulging in obsolete fashions of coats, and adopting a strange habit of carrying one of his gloves in his hand, even in cold weather. In time, the apparel gets worn—threadbare—slit—torn—patched—darned—let ink, thread, and judicious arrangement of person, do their best. He begins to wear a suspicious amount of whity-brown linen in the way of cravat. Collars fail. Frills retire. The vest is closed to the uppermost button, or even with a supplementary pin—a pin, in some circumstances, is the most squalid of all objects—at top. Still, at this period, he tries to carry a jaunty, genteel air; he has not yet all forgot himself to rags. But, see, the buttons begin to shew something like new moons at one side; these moons become full; they change; and then the button is only a little wisp of thread and rags, deprived of all retention over button-hole. His watch has long been gone to supply the current wants of the day. The vest by and by retires from business, and the coat is buttoned up to the chin. About this period, he perhaps appears in a pair of nankeen trousers, which, notwithstanding the coldness of the weather, he tries to sport in an easy, genteel fashion, as if it were his taste. If you meet him at this time, and inquire how he is getting on the world, he speaks very confidently of some excellent situation he has a prospect of, which will make him better than ever; it is perhaps to superintend a large new blacking manufactory which is to be set up, and for which two acres of stone-bottles, ten feet deep, have already been collected from all the lumber-cellars in the country—quite a nice easy business; nothing to do but collect the orders and see them executed; good salary, free house, coal, candle, and blacking; save a pound a year on the article of blacking alone. At length—but not perhaps till two or three years have elapsed—he becomes that lamentable picture of wretchedness which is his ultimate destiny; a mere pile of clothes without pile—a deplorable—a victim.

Mr John Kier was at one time, to all appearance, a respectable nursery and seedsman in Edinburgh. He seemed an unusually smart and active man, and therefore well qualified to make his way in life. I well remember with what an almost magical degree of celerity he could tie up little parcels of seeds. The eye nearly lost sight of his fingers, as it ceases to individualise the spokes of a wheel which is turned with great rapidity. Kier was the inventor of a curious tall engine, with a peculiar pair of scissors at top, for cutting fruit off trees.

This he sent through the principal streets every day with one of his boys, who was instructed to draw the string every now and then, so as to make the scissors close sharply. The boy would watch his men—broad-skirted men with top-boots—and, gliding in before them, would make the thing clip. ‘Boy, boy,’ the stranger would cry, ‘what’s that?’ The boy would explain; the interrogator would be delighted with the idea of cutting down any particular apple he chose out of a thickly-laden and unapproachable tree; and after that, nothing more was required than to give him the card of the shop. Unfortunately, Kier, with all his cleverness, was wanting in steady habits. This, with defective capital, ruined his business prospects. He failed—tried in vain to get a situation as traveller, clerk, or even shopman—and ere-long sunk into victimhood. After losing sight of him for two or three years, I one day met him on a road a little way out of town. He wore a coat buttoned to the chin, and which, being also very long in the breast, according to a fashion which obtained about the year 1813, seemed to enclose his whole trunk from neck to groin. With the usual cataract of cravat, he wore a hat of uncommonly melancholy aspect. His face was inflamed and agitated; and as he walked, he swung out his arms with a strange emphatic expression, as if he were saying: ‘I am an ill-used man; I shall tell it to the world.’ Misery had evidently given him a slight craze, as it often does. Some time afterwards, I saw him a little revivified through the influence of a somewhat better coat, and he seemed, from a small leathern parcel which he bore under his arm, to be engaged in some small agency. But this was a mere flash before expiration. He relapsed to rags and to wretchedness, and finally disappeared, and was seen no more.

Looking at victims as they appear in their daily walk, it is difficult to imagine how they obtain the means of livelihood. They hang much about taverns in the outskirts of the town. Perhaps a decent man from Penicuik, with the honest rustic name of Walter

Brown or James Gowans, migrates to the Candle-maker Row or the Grassmarket, and sets up a small public-house. You may know the man by his corduroy spatteredashes, and the latchets of his shoes drawn through them by two pyeholes. He is an honest man, believing everybody to be as honest as himself. Perhaps he has some antiquated and prescribed right to the site of a haystack at Penicuik, and is not without some glimmerings of a wish to try his fortune in the Parliament House. Well, the victims soon scent out his house by the glare of his new sign, and upon him they fall tooth and nail. Partly through simplicity, partly by having his feelings excited regarding the stance of the haystack, he gives these gentlemen some credit. For awhile you may observe a flocking of victims towards his doorway, like the gathering of clean and unclean things to Noah's Ark. But it is not altogether a case of deception. Victims, somehow or other, occasionally have money. True, it is seldom in greater sums than sixpence; but then, consider the importance of sixpence to a flock of victims. It effects a lodgment, and meat and drink for a day follows as an unavoidable consequence. Walter's barrels in time run dry, and he ceases to have the ability, even if he had the will, to give further supplies; but then there is always some new Walter ripening up as another gets exhausted. Our men have only to shift their ground.

One thing is always very remarkable in victims—namely, their extraordinary frankness and politeness. A victim might have been an absolute bear in his better days; but hunger, it is said, will tame a lion, and it seems to have the same effect in subduing the asperities of a victim. Meet a victim where you will—that is, before he has become altogether deplorable—and you are amazed at the bland, confidential air which he has assumed; so different, perhaps, from what he sported in better days. His manner, in fact, is most insinuating—into your pocket; and if you do not get alarmed at the symptoms, and break off in time, you are brought down for half-a-crown as sure as you live. Victims keep up a kind of constant civil war with shops. They mark those which have been recently opened, and where they see only young men behind the counter. They try to establish a kind of credit of face by now and then dropping in and asking, in a genteel manner, for a sight of a Directory, or for a bit of twine, or for ‘the least slip of paper,’ occasionally even spending a half-penny or a penny in a candid, honourable way, with all the air of a person wishing to befriend the shop. In the course of these transactions, they endeavour to excite a little conversation, beginning with the weather, gradually expanding to a remark upon the state of business, and perhaps ending with a sympathising inquiry as to the prospects which the worthy shopkeeper himself may have of succeeding in his present situation. At length, having laid down what painters call a priming, they come in some day, in a hurried fiddle-faddle kind of way, and hastily and confidentially ask across the counter: ‘Mr —— [victims are always particular in saying Mister], have you got such a thing as fourpence in ha’pence? I just want to pay a porter, and happen to have no change.’ The specification of ‘fourpence in ha’pence,’ though in reality nonsense, carries the day; it gives a plausibility and credit-worthiness to the demand that could not otherwise be obtained. The unfortunate shopkeeper, carried away by the contagious bustle of the victim, plunges his hand into the till to fulfil the request, and next instant finds himself standing alone in the shop, in pensive meditation on the folly of mankind, and the transitoriness of all earthly possessions.

The subsistence of a victim is the most precarious thing perhaps in the world. He is a man with no continuing dinner-place. He dines, as the poor old Earl of Findlater used to say, at the sign of the Mouth. It is a very strange thing, and what no one could suppose beforehand, that the necessitous are greatly indebted to the necessitous. People of this sort form a kind of community by themselves, and are more kind to each other mutually than is any other particular branch of the public to them as a class. Thus, the little that any one has will be shared by a great many companions, so that all have a mouthful. The necessitous are also very much the dupes of the necessitous: they are all, as it were, creatures of prey, the stronger constantly eating up the weaker. Thus, a victim in the last stage preys upon men who are entering the set; and all prey more or less upon poor tradesmen, such as the above Walter Brown or James Gowans, who are only liable to such a spoliation because they are poor and anxious for business. I remember a victim who had long passed the condition of being jail-worthy, and who lived in a great measure upon a man who had just begun a career of victimisation by being thrown into jail. This creature was content to be a kind of voluntary prisoner, for the sake of sharing the victuals and bed of his patron. It would astonish any man, accustomed, day after day, to go home to a spread table at a regular hour, to know the strange shifts which victims have to make in order to satisfy hunger—how much is done by raising small hard-wrung subsidies from former acquaintance—how much by duping—how much by what the Scotch people very expressively call sorning— how much by subdivision of mites among themselves. The victim is often witty, can sing one good comic song, has a turn for mimicry, or at least an amusing smack of worldly knowledge; and he is sometimes so lucky as to fall in with patrons little above himself in fortune, but still having something to give, who afford him their protection on account of such qualifications.

Natural gifts, and the force of habit, put it in the power of persons in the most wretched circumstances to exercise a fascinating influence over the veneration of some still humbler creature. Hence it is not surprising that there are such beings as fag-victims.

Nisbet of —, in Lanarkshire, originally a landed gentleman, and an advocate at the Scottish bar, was a blood of the first-water in the dissolute decade 1780–90. He had a coat edged round with goldlace; wore a gold watch on each side—an extravagant fashion then prevalent; and with his cane, bag-wig, and gold-buckled shoes, was really a fine figure of the pre-revolutionary era. His house was in the Canongate—a good flat in Chessells's Court—garrisoned only by a female servant called Nanny. Nisbet at length squandered away the whole of his estate, and became a victim. All the world fell away from him; but Nanny still remained. From the entailed family flat in Chessells's Court, he had to remove to a den somewhere about the Netherbow: Nanny went with him. Then came the period of wretchedness. Nanny, however, still stuck fast. The unfortunate gentleman could not himself appear in his wo-begone attire upon those streets where he had formerly shone a resplendent sun; neither could he bring his well-born face to solicit his former friends for subsidies. Nanny did all that was necessary. Foul day and fair day, she was to be seen gliding about the streets, either petitioning tradesmen for goods to her master on credit, or collecting food and money from the houses of his acquaintance. If a liquid alms was offered, she had a white tankard, streaked with smoky-looking cracks, for its reception; if the proffered article was a mass of flesh, she had a plate or a towel. There never was such a forager. Nisbet himself used to call her True and Trusty, by way of a compliment to her collective powers; and he finally found so much reason to appreciate her disinterested attachment, that, on reaching the usual fatal period of fifty, he made her his wife! What was the catastrophe of their story I have not heard.

A second instance of the fag-victim is of a still more touching character. Some years ago, there flourished, in one of the principal thoroughfares of Edinburgh, a fashionable perfumer, the inheritor of an old business, and a man of respectable connections, who, falling into dissolute habits, became of course very much embarrassed, and finally 'unfortunate.' In his shop

'From youth to age a reverend 'prentice grew;'
a man, at the time of his master's failure, advanced to nearly middle life, but who, having never been anywhere else since he was ten or twelve years of age, than behind Finlay's counter—Sundays and meal-hours only excepted—was still looked upon by his master as 'the boy of the shop,' and so styled accordingly. This worthy creature had, in the course of time, become as a mere piece of furniture in the shop; his soul had amalgamated with his situation. The drawers and shottles, the combs, brushes, and bottles, had entered into and become part of his own existence. He was on the best terms with everything about the shop; the handles of all things were fitted to his hand; everything came to him, like the instinctive use of his own members. Such a being was, as may be supposed, a useful servant. He knew all the customers; he knew his master's whole form of practice, all his habits, and every peculiarity of his temper. And then his fidelity; but that was chiefly shewn in the latter evil days of the shop, and during the victimhood of his master. As misfortune came on, the friendship of master and man became more intensely familiar and intimate than it had ever been before. As the proudest man, met by a lion in the desert, makes no scruple to coalesce with his servant in resisting it, so was Finlay induced, by the devouring monster Poverty, to descend to the level, and make a companion of his faithful Boy. They would at last go to the same tavern together, take the same Sunday walks—were, in reality, companions. In all Finlay's distresses, the Boy partook; 'something one day occurred about a bill,' as Crabbe says; it was the Boy who had the chief dolour of its accommodation; he would scour the North and South Bridges, with his hat off, borrowing small silver à l'improviste, as if to make up change to a customer, till he had the necessary sum amassed. The Boy at length became very much demoralised: he grew vicious towards the world, to be the more splendidly virtuous to his master: one grand redeeming quality, after the manner of Moses' serpent, had eaten up all the rest. It were needless to pursue the history of the shop through all its stages of declension.

Through them all the Boy survived, unshaken in his attachment. The shop might fade, grow dim, and die, but the Boy never. The goods might be diminished, the Duke of Wellington might be sold for whisky, and his lady-companions pawn their wigs for mutton-pies; but the Boy was a fixture. There was no pledging away his devoted, inextinguishable friendship. The master at last went to the Canongate Jail—I say went, because, however otherwise sentimental authors may write, imprisonment is with us generally a voluntary act, being designed for an end. The shop was still kept open, and the Boy attended it. But every evening did he repair to the dreary mansion, to solace his master with the news of the day, see after his comforts, and yield up the prey which, jackal-like, he had collected during the preceding four-and-twenty hours. This prey, be it remarked, was not raised from the sale of anything in the shop. Every saleable article had by this time been sold. The only furniture was now a pair of scissors and a comb, together with the announcement, ‘Hair-cutting Rooms,’ in the window. By means of these three things, however, the Boy contrived generally to fleece the public of a few sixpences in the day; and all these sixpences, with the exception of a small commission for his own meagre subsistence, went to his master at the Canongate Jail. Often, in the hour between eight and nine in the evening, have they sat in that small dingy back-room behind the hall, enjoying a bottle of strong ale, drunk out of stoneware tumblers—talking over all their embarrassments, and speculating how to get clear of them. Other prisoners had their wives or their brothers to see after them; but I question if any one had, even in these relations of kindred, a friend so attached as the Boy. At length, after a certain period, this unfortunate tradesman was one evening permitted to walk away, arm in arm, with his faithful young man, and the world was all before them where to choose.

of poignant misery; for at the only part of their career upon which I have happened to obtain any light, the Boy was wandering through the streets of Carlisle in the dress and appearance of a very old beggar, and singing the songs wherewith he had formerly delighted the citizens of Edinburgh in Johnnie Dowie's, for the subsistence of his master, who, as ascertained by my informant, was deposited in a state of extreme wretchedness in a low lodging-house in the suburbs. Such is the fag-victim, following his master and such, I may add, are the virtues which sometimes adorn the most vicious and degraded walks of life, where, to the eyes of ordinary observers, there appears no redeeming feature whatever.

SIDE by side with Victims, might be placed the kindred species Downdraughts, who are only different from the accident of their having friends who will rather be weighed down by them to the very earth, to the grave itself, than permit them to sink by themselves. The Downdraught is, in reality, a Victim, and one of the darkest shade, being generally a person totally worthless in character, and abandoned in habits; but then he has not altogether cut the cables which bound him to his native grade in society—he has not all forgot himself to stone; he is still domesticated with his friends; he has a mother, or a wife, or a brother, or a sister, or perhaps an old aunt, who will try to keep him in food and clean linen, and, having lost all hope of his ever being actively good, will do anything for him, if he will only preserve a neutrality, and not be positively evil. He is a victim in appearance—always excepting the clean shirt—but he enjoys the happy superiority over that class, of having an open door to fly to when he pleases, and either a kind relation, who considers him ‘only a little wild in the meantime’ or else one who, for the sake of decent appearances, will endeavour to patch up all his peccadilloes, and even be tyrannised over by him, rather than shock society by an open rupture. The personal tendencies of a Downdraught to victimisation are strong as the currents of the great deep, but he is withheld from it by others. He has always some anchorage or other upon decent life, to keep him back from the gulf to which he would otherwise hurry on. In many cases, the very kindness and indulgence of friends was the original cause of his becoming a Downdraught. He had everything held to his head. He was encouraged in his pretences of headaches as an excuse for staying away from school. When afterwards an apprentice, he was permitted to break off, on the score of being compelled to put on fires and sweep out the shop. Or, perhaps, it was from none of those causes. Possibly, he was just one of those persons who seem to be totally destitute of all perception of the terms upon which men are permitted to exist in this world—that is, that they are either to be so fortunate as to have ‘their fathers born before them,’ so that they may accede to wealth without exertion, or must else do something to induce their fellow-creatures to accord them the means of livelihood without beggary. That many persons are really born without this great leading faculty, is unfortunately but too indisputable; and, assuredly, they are as proper inmates for a lunatic asylum as more frantic madmen; for what is the use of reason, or even of talent, without the desire of exerting it, either in one’s own behalf, or in behalf of mankind? The terms of existence we allude to are expressed in the text of Scripture, ‘By the sweat of thy brow thou shalt earn thy bread;’ so that the man must be considered a kind of heretic, as well as a fool, who will not, or cannot, understand them. Yet the fact is so, that many men arrive at maturity with either a sense of these conditions of life more or less imperfect, or no sense of them at all. They perhaps conceive themselves to be born to keep down the pavement of Princes Street with boots one inch and a half deep in the heel, or to fumigate the air of that elegant street with cigars at three shillings per dozen ; but that is the utmost extent to which their notions of the purposes of life ever extend. These men, of course, are predestined Downdraughts. We see them already, with our mind's eye, exhausting the kindness and patience of a brother, or a wife, yea, almost of a mother, with their idle and dissolute habits—dragging those relations slowly but surely down into misery and disgrace—and only in the meantime saved from being kicked out of doors, as they deserve, not by any regard for merits of their own, for they have none, but by the tenderness of those relations for their own reputation.

A decent citizen, of the name of Farney, retired about five-and-twenty years ago from active life, and, planting himself in a neat villa a little way beyond the southern suburbs of Edinburgh, resolved to do nothing all the rest of his life but enjoy the ten or twelve thousand pounds which he had made by business. He was a placid, inoffensive old man, only somewhat easy in his disposition, and, therefore, too much under the control of his wife, who, unfortunately, was a person of a vulgarly ambitious character. The pair had but one child, a daughter, Eliza Farney—the toast of all the apprentices in the South Bridge, and really an elegant, and not unaccomplished young lady. The only object which Mr and Mrs Farney now had in life, besides that of enjoying all its comforts, was the disposal of this young lady in marriage. Whenever there is such a thing as ten thousand pounds connected with the name of a young lady, there is generally a great deal of more fuss made about it than when the sum is said to exist in any other shape or circumstances. It is important in the eyes of all the young men who think themselves within shot of it. It is important in the eyes of all the young women who have to lament that they do not possess similar advantages. It is important in the eyes of all the fathers and mothers of sons who think themselves within range of it. And, lastly, it is important, immensely important indeed, in the eyes of parties, young lady, mother and father, sister or brother, who have anything to say in the disposal of it. Money in this shape, one would almost think, is of a different value from money in any other : the exchange it bears against cash in business, or cash in the prospect of him who knows he can win it, is prodigious. At the very lowest computation, a thousand pounds in the purse of a young lady is worth ten thousand in the stock of a man of trade. Nay, it is astonishing what airs we have known a few hundred pounds of this kind put on in respect, or rather disrespect, of decent people, who were almost winning as much in the year. In fact, the fiddle-faddle about the disposal of an heiress is a great farce, and never fails to put either the parties concerned in the disposal, or else the candidates for the acquisition, into a thousand shabby and selfish attitudes. It is hard to say if the young lady herself is the better for it all. The only certain effect of her possessing a fortune is, that it deprives her of ever having the pleasing assurance, given to most other women, that she is married for her own sake alone. Sincere love is apt to retire from such a competition, through the pure force of modesty, its natural accompaniment ; and the man most apt to be successful is he who, looking upon the affair as only a mercantile adventure, pursues it as such, and only hopes to be able to fall in love after marriage.

It happened that Eliza Farney was loved, truly and tenderly loved, by a young man of the name of Russell, whose parents had been acquainted with the Farneys in their earlier and less prosperous days, but were now left a little behind them. Young Russell had been the playmate of Eliza in their days of childhood ; he had read books with her, and taught her to draw, in their riper youth ; and all the neighbours said, that, but for the brilliant prospects of Miss Farney, she could not have found a more eligible match. Russell, however, was still but the son of a poor man. He was himself struggling in the commencement of a business, which he had begun with slender means, in order to sustain the declining fortunes of his parents. His walk in life was much beneath the scope of his abilities, much beneath his moral deserts; but, under a strong impulse of duty, he had narrowed his mind to the path allotted to him, instead of attempting to do justice to his talents by entering upon any higher and more perilous pursuit. Thus, as often happens, an intellect and character, which might have brightened the highest destinies, were doomed to a sphere all unmeet for them, where they were in a manner worse than lost, as they only led to a suspicion which was apt to be unfavourable to the prospects of their possessor—namely, that he was likely to be led, by his superior tastes, into pursuits to which his fortune was inadequate, or into habits which would shipwreck it altogether. Russell looked upon Eliza Farney, and despaired. He saw her, as she advanced into womanhood, recede gradually from his sphere in society, and enter into one more suitable to her father's improving fortunes, into which it was not for him to intrude. Eliza had, perhaps, entertained at one time a girlish fondness for him; but it was not of so strong a character as to resist the ambitious maxims of her mother, and the sense of her own importance and prospects, which began to act upon her in her riper years.

Some appearance of coldness, which he saw, or fancied he saw, in her conduct towards him, caused his proud and pure nature to shrink back from the vulgar competition which was going forward for the hand of ‘the heiress.’ It was not that the fondest wishes of his heart were met with disappointment—perhaps he could have endured that—but he writhed under the reflection, that external circumstances should separate hearts that once were allied, and that no conscious purity of feeling, no hope of hereafter distinguishing himself by his abilities, was of avail against the selfish and worldly philosophy which dictated his rejection. It was only left for him to retire into the chambers of his own thoughts, and there form such solemn resolutions for improving his circumstances, and distinguishing his character, as might hereafter, perhaps, enable him to prove to the cold being who now despised him, how worthy, how more than worthy perhaps, he was of having enjoyed her affections, even upon the mean calculations by which he was now measured and found wanting.

The mother, to whom this rupture was chiefly owing, now applied herself heartily to the grand task of getting her daughter 'properly disposed of.' Every month or so, her house was turned topsy-turvy, for the purpose of shewing off the young lady in gay assemblies. Care was taken that no one should be invited to these assemblies who was merely of their own rank. Unless some capture could be made in a loftier, or what appeared a loftier circle, it was all as nothing. The human race hang all in a concatenation at each other's skirts—those before kicking with all their might to drive off those behind them, at the same time that they are struggling might and main, despite of corresponding kicks, to hold fast, and pull themselves up by means of their own predecessors. This is particularly the case where a mother has a daughter to dispose of with the reversion of a few thousands. Money under these circumstances, as already explained, would be absolutely thrown away if given only to a person who estimated it at its ordinary value; it must be given to one who will appreciate it as it ought to be, and sell pounds of free-will and honourable manhood for shillings of the vile dross. At length, at a ball held in the Archers' Hall—a kind of Almacks in the east—the very man was met with: a genteel young spark, said to be the grand-nephew to a baronet in the north, and who was hand in glove with the Greigsons, a family of quis quis gentility in the New Town, but who loomed very large in the eyes of a person dwelling in the south side. This fellow, a mere loose adventurer, whose highest destiny seemed to be to carry a pair of colours, if he could get them, and who positively had no claims upon consideration whatsoever, except that he kept a decent suit of clothes upon his back, and was on terms of intimacy with a family supposed to belong to the haut ton—this poor, unannealed wretch, recommended by impudence and a moustache, which he amiably swore he would take off when married, gained the prize from which the modest merit of Russell was repelled. In a perfect fluster of delight with the attention he paid to her daughter, terrified lest he should change his mind, or any unforeseen event prevent the consummation so devoutly to be wished, the managing mother presented no obstruction to the courtship. ‘Such a genteel young man!’ she would say to her husband. ‘He is greatly taken out in good company. Just the night before last, he was at the Honourable Mrs —’s party in Oman’s Rooms. He danced with Miss Foster, the great heiress, who, they say, is distractedly in love with him. But he says she has naething like the elegant carriage o’ our ’Liza. Indeed, between you and me, says he, jokingly, to me the other day, she’s splay-footed. He could make his fortune at once, you see, however; and I’m sure it’s really extraordinary o’ him to particulareese the like o’ us in the way he’s doing’—and so forth.

The old man sat twirling his thumbs, and saying nothing, but having his own fears all the time that all was not really gold that glittered. He was, however, one of those people who, upon habit and principle, never say a single word about any speculative thing that is proposed to them, till the result has been decided, and then they can tell that they all along thought it would turn out so. It was untelling the prescience and wisdom that old Farney believed himself to be thus possessed of. Suffice it to say, the managing mother, within the month, made out a mittimus of destruction in favour of her daughter, Eliza Farney, spinster, consigning her to the custody of William Dempster, Esq., blackguard by commission, and Downdraught by destiny.

The fortune of Miss Farney was not exactly of the kind that suited Mr Dempster's views. It was only payable after the death of her father. Mr Dempster, therefore, saw it to be necessary to take expedients for obtaining the use of it by anticipation. He commenced a large concern in some mercantile line, obtaining money in advance from the old gentleman in order to set the establishment on foot. He also procured his signature to innumerable bills, to enable him to carry it on. The business, in reality, was a mere mask for obtaining the means of supporting his own depraved tastes and appetites. There was hardly any kind of extravagance, any kind of vice, which he did not indulge in at the expense of old Farney. The result was what might be expected from such premises. Exactly a twelvemonth after the marriage, Dempster stopped payment, and absconded without so much as even taking leave of his wife. His folly and profligacy together had already absorbed the whole fortune with which Mr Farney had retired from business, besides a good deal more for which the unfortunate old man was security. He was in consequence totally ruined, left destitute in old age, without the least resource; while the young, elegant female, who, a short year before, was the admiration and envy of glittering circles, had just become a mother, upon the bed which only waited for her convalescence to be sold for behoof of her husband's creditors.

Farney found refuge—and considered himself most fortunate in finding it—in a beneficiary institution for decayed citizens, of which he had himself, in better days, been one of the managers, but which he did not live long to enjoy. His wife, about the same time, died of one of those numberless and varied diseases which can only be traced to what is called a broken heart. The daughter—the unhappy, and, in a great measure, guiltless victim of her wretched ambition—had no eventual resource, for the support of herself and her infant, but to open a small school, in which she taught female children the elements of reading, writing, and sewing. The striking infelicity of her fate, joined to her own well-known taste and industrious habits, in time obtained for her considerable patronage in this humble occupation ; and she would eventually have been restored to something like comfort, but for the unhallowed wretch whose fate had become identified with her own. Where this fellow went, or how he subsisted, for the three years during which he was absent, no one ever knew. He was heard to talk of the smugglers in the Isle of Man, and of the United Irishmen of the sister isle ; but it can only be surmised that he joined these respectable corps. One day, as Mrs Dempster sat in the midst of her little flock of pupils, the door was opened, and in crawled her prodigal husband, emaciated, travel-worn, and beggar-like, with a large black spot upon one of his cheeks, the result of some unimaginably low and scoundrelly brawl. The moment she recognised him, she fainted in her chair ; the children dispersed and fled from the house, like a flock of chickens at sight of the impending hawk ; and when the unfortunate woman recovered, she found herself alone with this transcendant wretch, the breaker of the peace of her family, the murderer of her mother. He accosted her in the coolest manner possible, said he was glad to see her so comfortably situated, and expressed an anxiety for food and liquor. She went with tottering steps to purvey what he wanted ; and while she was busied in her little kitchen, he sat down by her parlour fire, and commenced smoking from a nasty black pipe, after the manner of the lowest mendicants. When food and drink were set before him, he partook of both with voracious appetite. Mrs Dempster sat looking on in despair, for she saw that the presence of this being must entirely blight the pleasant scene which her industry had created around her. She afterwards said, however, that she could have perhaps overlooked all, and even again loved this deplorable wretch, if he had inquired for his child, or expressed a desire to see him. He did neither ; he seemed altogether bent on satisfying his own gross appetites. After spending a few hours in sulky unintermittent smoking and drinking, he was conveyed to a pallet in the garret, there to sleep off his debauch.

It were needless to go through all the distressing details of what ensued. Dempster henceforth became a Downdraught on his wife. This forlorn woman often confessed to her friends that she was perfectly willing to support her husband, provided he would be but content with the plain fare she could offer him, and just walk about and do nothing. But he was not of a temper to endure this listlessness. He required excitement. Instead of quietly spending his forenoons in the arbour, called the Cage, in the Meadows, among decayed military pensioners and other harmless old men, he prowled about the crowded, mean thoroughfares, drinking where he could get liquor for nothing, and roistering in companies of the most debased description. He incurred debts in all directions on the strength of his wife's character, and she was necessarily compelled to liquidate them. The struggles which she at this time made were very great. Like the mother of Gray the poet, she endured all kinds of ill-usage, and persevered under every difficulty to give her son a respectable education, in order that he might have an opportunity of wiping away the stains of his father's vices, and be a comfort to his mother in the decline of life. To do this, and at the same time continue paying the vile debts of her profligate husband, was altogether impossible. She exhausted the beneficence, and even tired the pity of her friends. It need hardly be mentioned, that the creditors of a husband have an undeniably claim upon the effects of his wife. It unfortunately happened that the wretches with whom Dempster contracted his debts were as worthless as himself. After draining every resource which his wife could command, he summed up his villainy by giving a promissory-note for fifteen pounds to one of his lowest associates. It is supposed that he struck the bargain for a couple of guineas, for with this sum he again absconded from Edinburgh, and, taking his way to Greenock, shipped himself on board of a vessel for America. At first, his wife was thankful for the relief; she again breathed freely; but her joy was soon turned into mourning. The promissory-note made its appearance; she had just scraped up and paid her rent; she had not, therefore, a farthing in the world. In a fortnight, the whole of her effects were sold upon distress. She was turned to the street a second time, almost bent to the dust with the burden of her miseries. The first night she received shelter in the house of a respectable 'much-tried' widow, who was the only person she could freely speak to about her destitute condition. Next day, by the advice of this good woman, she took a room in the neighbourhood, and endeavoured to gather together her pupils, who, it seems, did not desert her, but took a deep interest in her misfortunes. She had also the good-fortune to get her boy into one of the educational hospitals, and she, therefore, expressed herself thankful for the mercies she still received.

An interval of many years now occurs in the story of Mrs Dempster, during which she heard nothing of her husband, except a rumour that he was drowned on a lumbering excursion in the rapids of the St Lawrence. Through the influence of her pitiable tale and real merit, she obtained the situation of superintendent of a large public seminary for young ladies in a country town. Here she lived in peace, comfort, and honour, for some years, till she had almost forgot that ever such a wretch as Dempster existed. What was her horror one day, when, as she was entertaining a large party of respectable people at tea, the demon of her fate stood once more before her, not the mere squalid beggar which he formerly appeared, but a concentration of blackguardism and shabbiness, of utterly ruined and broken-down humanity, such as was never perhaps surpassed even in the sinks of London and Parisian vice. There was now more than mendicancy in his aspect: there was robbery, murder, and every kind of desperate deed. The wan face, blackened and battered with bruises and wounds; the troubled eye, bespeaking the troubled spirit; the ropy, sooty attire, through which peeped the hardly whiter skin ; the feet bare and ulcerated with walking ; everything told but one tale of unutterable sin and misery. The guests shrunk aghast from this hideous spectre, and the hostess shrieked outright. Little regarding the alarm which he had occasioned, he exclaimed, in a hollow and scarcely earthly voice : ‘ Give me meat ; give me drink ; give me clothing ; I am destitute of all. There you sit in enjoyment of every luxury, while your husband, who is flesh of your flesh, has not known what it is to eat heartily, or to be covered from the piercing wind, for weeks and months ! Do not shrink from me. Wretched as I seem, I am still your husband. Nothing on earth can break that tie. Meat, I say—drink ! I am in my own house, and will be obeyed. For you, gentles, get you gone ; your company is not now agreeable.’ The company dispersed without further ceremony, leaving the unhappy woman alone with her husband.

Next day, the stranger appeared abroad in a decent suit of clothes, and Mrs Dempster seemed to have recovered a little of her equanimity. Every sacrifice, however, which she could make for this wretch, was in vain, or only encouraged him to demand greater indulgences. An unlimited supply of liquor in his own house would not satisfy him. He required large sums wherewith to treat all the canaille of the town. Entreaties, indulgences, everything that could be devised to gratify him, were unavailing to impress him with a sense of his wife’s situation. He intruded his unhallowed front into her school, and insulted her before her pupils. Those who laughed at his antics, he would seize by the shoulders, and turn out of doors. He had also a most perverse desire of pushing himself into her presence, whenever he thought she was conversing with any of her employers, before whom an observance of propriety and decorum was most particularly necessary. Indeed, he just delighted to do exactly what his wife wished him not to do ; the grand object of his low mind being to shew how much he had her comfort and welfare in his power. At length, with every feeling of respect for Mrs Dempster, her employers, the magistrates, found it necessary to inform her, that they could not permit her to retain the school any longer under such circumstances, as it was threatened with utter annihilation by the gradual diminution of the number of pupils. She proposed to her husband to allow him regularly the full half of her earnings, if he would only stay in some other place, and never again intrude upon her. But he scorned to be bought off, as he said. He insisted rather upon her giving up the school, and accompanying him to Edinburgh, where, with the little sum she had saved, and what besides they could raise by the sale of her superfluous furniture, he would enter into business on his own account, and should never again be obliged to work for either herself or for him. The poor woman had no alternative. She was compelled to abandon the scene where, for so many years, she had enjoyed the comforts of life and the respect of society, in order, to be dragged at the chariot wheels, or rather at the cart's tail, of her husband's vices and fortunes, through scenes to which she shuddered to look forward.

In the capital, Dempster's design of entering into business, if he ever seriously entertained it, was no more talked of. Fleshed once again with a taste of his former indulgences, he rushed headlong into that infamous career which already had twice ended in voluntary banishment. His wife's finances were soon exhausted; but, with the barbarity of a demon taskmaster, he would every day leave her with a threat, which she but too well knew he would execute, of beating her, if she should not be able to produce next morning a sum necessary for the gratification of his wretched appetites. It was now in vain to attempt that mode of subsistence by which she had hitherto supported herself. So long as she was haunted by this evil genius, that was impracticable. By the interest, however, of some of her former friends, she obtained a scanty and precarious employment for her needle, by which she endeavoured to supply the cravings of her husband, and her own simpler wants. From morning early, through the whole day, and till long after midnight, this modest and virtuous woman would sit in her humble lodging, painfully exerting herself at a tedious and monotonous task, that she might be able to give to her husband in the morning that sum without which she feared he would only rush into greater mischief, if not into absolute crime. No vigils were grudged, if she only had the gratification at last of seeing him return. Though he often stayed away the whole night, she never could permit herself to suppose that he would do so again, but she would sit bending over her work, or, if she could work no more from positive fatigue, gazing into the dying embers of her fire, watching and watching for the late and solitary foot, which, by a strange exertion of the sense, she could hear and distinguish long ere any sound would have been perceptible to another person. Alas, for the sleepless nights which woman so often endures for the sake of her cruel helpmate! Alas, for the generous and enduring affection which woman cherishes so often for the selfish heart by which it is enslaved!

A time at length arrived when the supplies purveyed by Mrs Dempster from her own earnings were quite incompetent to satisfy this living vampire. She saw him daily rush from her presence, threatening that he would bring her to the extremity of disgrace by the methods he would take to obtain money. She lived for weeks in the agonising fear that the next moment would bring her news of some awful crime committed by his hand, and for which he was likely to pay the last penalty of the law. She hardly knew who or what were his associates; but occasionally she learned, from mutterings in his sleep, that his practices were of the most flagitious and debased kind. He seemed to be the leader or director of a set of wretches who made a livelihood by midnight burglary. At length, one day he came home at an unusual hour, accompanied by three strangers, with whom he entered into conversation in the next room. Between that apartment and the room in which she was sitting, there was a door, which, being never used, was locked up. Through the thin panels, she overheard a scheme laid for entering the house of ——, a villa in the neighbourhood, in order to rob the tenant, whom they described as a gentleman just returned from the East Indies, with a great quantity of plate and other valuables. One of the persons in conference had visited the house, through the kindness of a servant, to whom he had made up as a sweetheart, and he therefore was able to lead the attack through such a channel as rendered success almost certain. ‘The nabob,’ said this person, ‘sleeps in a part of the house distant from the room in which his boxes are for the present deposited. But should he attempt to give us any disturbance, we have a remedy for that, you know’—and here the listener’s blood ran cold at hearing a pistol cocked. From all that she could gather, her husband was only to keep watch at the outside of the house, while the rest should enter in search of the booty. It is impossible to describe the horror with which she heard the details of the plot. Her mind was at first in such a whirl of distracted feeling, that she hardly knew where she stood; but as the scheme was to be executed that very evening, she saw it necessary to exert herself quickly and decisively; and, therefore, she immediately went to the house of a friend, and wrote an anonymous note to the person most concerned, warning him of a design—she could use no more specific language—which she knew was entertained against a certain part of his property, and recommending him to have it removed to some more secure part of his house. To make quite sure of this note being delivered in time, she took it herself to the gate, and left it with the porter, whom she strictly enjoined to give it immediately into the hands of his master. She then went home, and spent an evening of misery more bitter than the cup of death itself. She had formerly passed many a lonely night at her cheerless fireside, while waiting for the return of her wretched husband; but she never spent one like this. When she reflected upon the happiness of her early days, and the splendid prospects which were then said to lie before her, and contrasted them with the misery into which she had been so suddenly plunged, not by any fault of her own, but, as it appeared, by the mere course of destiny, she could have almost questioned the justice of that Supreme Power by which she piously believed the concerns of this lower world to be adjusted. What dire calamities had sprung to her from one unfortunate step! What persecutions she had innocently endured! How hopeless was her every virtuous exertion against the perverse counteraction of a being from whom society could not permit her to be disjoined! And, finally, what an awful outburst of wretchedness was at this moment, to appearance, impending over her! Then she recalled one gentle recollection, which occasionally would steal into her mind, even in her darkest hours, and fill it with an agreeable, but still painful light—the thought of Russell—Russell, the kind and good, whom, in a moment of girlish vanity, she had treated harshly, so that he vanished from her presence for ever, and even from the place where he had suffered her scorn. Had fate decreed that she should have been united to that endeared mate of her childhood, how different might have been her lot! how different, also, perhaps, might have been his course of life; for she feared that her ungenerous cruelty had also made shipwreck of his noble nature. These meditations were suddenly disturbed by the entrance of Dempster, who rushed into her room, holding a handkerchief upon his side, and pale, gory, and breathless, fell upon the ground before her. Almost ere she had time to ascertain the reality of this horrid vision, quick footsteps were heard upon the stair. The open door gave free admission; and in a moment the room was half filled with watchmen, at the head of whom appeared a middle-aged gentleman of a prepossessing though somewhat disordered exterior. ‘This,’ he exclaimed, ‘is the villain: secure him, if he be yet alive; but I fear he has already met the punishment which is his due.’ The watchmen raised Dempster from the ground, and, holding his face to the light, found that the glaze of death was just taking effect upon his eyes. The unhappy woman shrieked as she beheld the dreadful spectacle, and would have fallen upon the ground if she had not been prevented by the stranger, who caught her in his arms. Her eyes, when they first re-opened, were met by those of RUSSELL!

It would be difficult to describe the feelings with which these long-severed hearts again recognised each other; the wretchedness into which she was plunged, by learning that her well-intended efforts had unexpectedly led to the death of her husband; or the returning tide of grateful and affectionate emotion which possessed his bosom, on being informed that those efforts had saved his life, not to speak of the deep sensation of pity with which he listened to the tale of her life. A tenderer feeling than friendship was now impossible, and, if it could have existed, would have hardly been in good taste; but Russell, now endowed with that wealth which, when he had it not, would have been of so much avail, contented himself to use it in the pious task of rendering the declining years of Eliza Farney as happy as her past life had been miserable.

SHOWMAN LIFE.

IT has been said, that 'one half of the world does not know how the other half lives;' and with a view to remedy this shortcoming in knowledge, there have of late been revelations of all kinds regarding all sections of the unknowing and unknown. Some of these revelations are satisfactory—we refer to style of narration, and not moral results—and others are very much the reverse; but the best of such descriptions necessarily fall far short of what could be communicated by any of the parties themselves, were they possessed of the requisite literary ability. Events or modes of life can never be so well narrated or described by those who record them 'second-hand,' as they would be—other circumstances being equal—by the actors or participators in such scenes. Within a short period, our literature has been enriched by two works illustrating the life of the common sailor—Dana's Two Years Before the Mast, and Melville's Typee and Omoo; and it is not enough to say, that they Daguerreotype the forecastle in a way different from such as Smollett or Cooper, but they also transcend such nautical authors as Marryatt and Chamier, whose maritime knowledge admits of no dispute; and this for the simple reason, that all these belonged to the quarter-deck, and the others to the common deck—a difference as broad as that subsisting between the parlour and the kitchen.

We have stumbled on the Autobiography of a Showman (published by Mr Wilson, Leeds), a work which, although not written with the talent either of a Dana or a Melville, is, nevertheless, the composition of one who tells his story naturally and effectively, and whose history abounds with interest and amusement.

David Prince Miller was born in London; when, he does not tell us, and the omission is of no consequence. Like thousands of other young men, he had, in early life, an irrepressible taste for theatricals; and after a short commercial career, duly marked by spouting and grimace, at seasons convenient and inconvenient, he was launched on the ocean of professional life in this wise:—He was carrying home £.18 to his father one day, when a street-show, opposite Astley's, attracted his attention; and he dropped a shilling into the proffered hat. The showmen, observing that he was a lad that might be rendered useful, decoyed him into a public-house; a treat followed. He was put to bed, and on awaking next morning, he was ashamed to leave the wretched company into which he had unfortunately got. In a word, by an act of folly, he cast himself aloof from respectable society; and in keeping up his father's money, he may be said to have begun the world dishonestly as well as heedlessly. Wanting the courage to go home and confess his fault, he remained with the show-people, by whom he was civilly used so long as his money lasted. When it was gone, so was courtesy, and he was at last left to shift for himself. His first engagement in professional life was as spokesman in the establishment of one Mr Richardson, of whom more anon. For standing outside and bawling out: 'Walk up, ladies and gentlemen; recollect this is Richardson's company,' with such additional reflections as fancy might suggest, he was rewarded at the rate of 7s. per diem; but after the large fairs were over, Mr Richardson curtailed his staff, and our author being amongst the dismissed, he had to look out for a new appointment. In his subsequent career, he personated a giantess, acted as a conjurer, performed as an equestrian, trod in barns as a stroller, and even exhibited as a pugilist.

Our autobiographer is copious on the impostures of beggars; and shews, very conclusively, that however helpless the maimed and the halt may appear in thoroughfares, there is no safety in giving alms to street-beggars. Pavement - caligraphers, Spitalfield - weavers, sailors with sore arms—all are cheats. As regards the last, we are told that chewed tobacco rubbed over a coat of tallow simulates skin - disease of the most horrible kind. He is also cunning in the exposition of rouge et noir, thimble-rig, lotteries, &c.; and we would advise those who are inclined to try their luck at these games, to consult Mr Miller in the first instance, who will undoubtedly tell them 'something to their advantage.'

We leave these deceptions, and turn to the more pleasant topic of showmen's illusions. We regard them as comparatively light offences, more amusing than vicious; and we do so on the authority of Mr Miller, who remarks, that he 'considers the extravagant tales told by the showmen regarding their exhibitions, as the most amusing thing about them; and that there are few persons who enter these places, but make up their minds to be humbugged, and many would feel disappointed were it not so.'

At one establishment where the author was doorsman, the 'wonders consisted of a giantess, nearly eight feet high; a dwarf, thirty-six inches in height; and a lady with white hair. The dwarf was a little decrepit old woman, yet in the bills she was depicted as symmetry itself. The white-haired lady was certainly a curiosity, although now no great novelty, for there are few fairs at which a white-haired lady may not be seen. And the giantess, who was exhibited as nearly eight feet high, was in reality about five feet ten.

‘Those who have seen those tall ladies exhibited must have observed, that the dress always concealed the feet, although, when sitting, they display their foot and shoe, to convince the spectator, as they say, that there is no deception. When they walk down the caravan, it is upon tiptoe; and when standing, a small stool upon rollers, concealed by the length of the dress, and which is pushed out of sight by the giantess’s foot, when the level is shewn, and upon which the lady stands when displaying her amazing stature.

‘Some years previous to this, he had had a black giantess, who, owing to her getting married, left his concern. He still retained her dress, and proposed that I should personate the black giantess, who, he said, was about my size. I at first refused, but he became so importunate that I consented, for he was not a bad sort of a man, notwithstanding his present attempt at imposition, which I considered harmless, and almost excusable under his peculiar circumstances; for as he was also very short of money, the loss of the fair might altogether ruin him. I consequently was attired in a fantastic sort of dress, which was composed of feathers, beads, &c.; and was exhibited as the great black giantess, nearly eight feet high; of course, my face had to undergo the operation of being blackened with burned cork and grease. We had a very good fair. A number expressed their doubts as to my being what was alleged. Sometimes a drunken fellow would attempt to take liberties with me, when my ladyship would most indignantly repel the insult by giving the fellow a sound thump on the head; indeed, I was compelled to be very violent, for too close an inspection would have exposed the whole affair.

'The crowd retired from the caravan, expressing their contempt at the exhibition; but, amidst the noisy din of drums and trumpets, nobody heard them; the proprietor at the same time bawling through a speaking-trumpet: "Hear what they say of the black giantess; never saw such a sight before: hear them! They say it's worth a shilling apiece. Come on—only a penny!" And another crowd would rush in to see the tall, black Indian queen, as I was denominated.

'As a matter of course, I was totally unacquainted with the English language, and had only been in this country a few weeks; that I was brought over by Captain Somebody, at a tremendous expense, and only permitted to be exhibited for a limited period, previous to my return to my own country. A conversation was held between me and my proprietor, in a language which neither of us could understand, nor any one else comprehend, but which he interpreted to the audience.'

On one occasion, Mr Miller was concerned in shewing that famous personage, the 'Pig-faced Lady.' Her ladyship, as he tells us, 'was nothing more nor less than a shaved bear! The poor animal was strapped in a chair, and was compelled to retain such a position as a female would do when sitting. She was represented on the outside as a well-dressed female, of course, with a pig's face; and the man who invited the people to pay a visit to see this extraordinary woman, would represent her to be a most amiable creature. "She eats," says he, "out of a silver trough. I do not wish," he continues, "to impose upon you, ladies and gentlemen, by stating that the lady is gifted with speech, but she will convince you of her superior intellect by answering any question in writing; she writes a most beautiful hand, and plays in the most scientific and ~~useful~~ style upon the pianoforte; at times, she favours the company with grunting in the most harmonious manner, accompanying herself upon the instrument. Again, ladies and gentlemen, I cannot think of imposing upon you by asserting that she actually sings songs ; she cannot do anything of the kind, but a person with a good ear for music may easily distinguish the air the lady is grunting." . . . . The only time the lady grunts is when she receives a sly probe with some sharp instrument, which experiment is frequently inflicted upon the poor animal, when they wish the audience to believe she is answering questions.'

All visitors at shows have witnessed the gastronomic experiment of making pancakes in a hat. This is done with the aid of a tin dish, slyly slipped into the bottom of the hat. Miller was a proficient at this trick, but on one occasion the tin was unfortunately forgot to be inserted. 'I commenced,' says he, 'breaking the eggs, &c. into the jar, and with all the assurance the conjuring fraternity generally assume, poured it into, as I supposed, the tin dish within the hat. It was never my system to look into the hat, for fear of exciting suspicion, and I never doubted but the dish was inserted within ; but what was my consternation when I did look into the hat, to find that the uncooked pancake was spread all over the lining—my attendant having forgotten to slip the dish in. The fact was, a curious old gentleman had so bothered me and my assistant, that he forgot to put it in. I looked very spooney for a few seconds, but I considered the loss of a hat nothing to them, and I acknowledged the mistake that had been made, exposed how the trick should have been done, and laid the blame upon the shoulders of the old gentleman, who really was the cause. As I expected, they were more delighted at this than they were at the most successful of my experiments. After the performance, I was most hospitably entertained, and was provided with a conveyance back to Kelso the same evening.'

Another well-known feat is the Walking Shilling.

though some people make them fly fast enough, and without much trouble. Get a long hair from the head of a female; to one end of it attach a piece of shoemaker's wax, fasten the other to a pin, pin it to the bottom of your waistcoat, letting the piece of wax dangle about at the full length of the hair. If you wish to perform it as a trick, ask some one to lend you a shilling. During the time they are getting the shilling, endeavour to put the wax between your finger and thumb. Take the shilling, and stick the wax to it, which may be easily done while you are examining it, pretending to see whether it is a good one. Take care to fix the wax to the under part of the shilling, so that it may not be seen, then throw it carelessly on the table. Move your body from it, and of course it will follow you; hold your hand on a level with the edge of the table, and the shilling walks into it. With practice, you may make it walk from one hand to the other, or throw it into a glass of water, and cause it to walk out. When you return the shilling to its owner, you can easily pick off the wax with your finger-nail.'

The gun-trick is regarded by our author as a small affair, he having often performed it for 'the small charge of one penny'; but he does not offer any explanation of the secret.

Among the numerous shifts to which necessity reduced the author, one was to deliver the bills of a travelling physician, who called himself Dr De Magno. 'This fellow, notwithstanding his kindness to me, was the most cruel impostor I ever met. His mode of doing business was thus. Guided by a chalk-mark I had made on a conspicuous place near the door upon the delivery of the bill, he would thunder a double-rap at the door. Having introduced himself, he would express a hope that all were well in health; he would then inquire whether his servant had left one of his bills. "Beautiful child that," said the doctor, observing a fine, healthy, rosy-cheeked child playing about the floor; "but he has got the worms." The woman said she thought not; but of course the doctor knew best—he could tell by the appearance of the child's eyes. He then commenced describing the various symptoms attendant upon such a complaint; amongst the rest, he remarked it was a sure sign of worms when children had voracious appetites; and there were few of these poor people who did not acknowledge that their children had tremendous appetites. He generally succeeded in disposing of some of his trash. He would also at times accost an elderly-looking person (when he had observed a young woman in the house whom he had supposed to be a daughter), and after introducing himself as usual with "All well here I hope," would request a private conversation for a few minutes; which request having been granted, he would inquire: "Pray, is that young woman your daughter?" The reply being probably in the affirmative, he would continue: "Well, don't be alarmed, but that young woman is in the first stage of consumption!" "Indeed, sir, she is in excellent health," might be the reply. "Don't tell me," says Dr Magno; "I have had too much experience in these cases not to know my business. I have made consumption my most particular study; in fact, I never lost a patient in its first stages, which, I believe, is more than any other man in my profession can assert. This bottle"—now introducing his medicine—"is invaluable; I usually sell it at ten shillings; but you'll excuse me for making the remark, but you don't seem to be overrich, and as I consider it a pity so fine a young woman should be sacrificed for a trifle, you shall have it for five shillings." And thus he generally succeeded in obtaining a sale, and often got five shillings for a bottle of trash not worth a penny.'

Disgusted with this charlatan, Miller divulged his imposture to a poor family whom he was about to victimise, and the result was a separation between them.

We now proceed to consider the inner revelations of showman life. One serious class of annoyances to which showmen are exposed, is the brutality of mobs. Thus, when in Newcastle, the author and his partner—commercial, not conjugal—had to watch their humble tent for whole nights, to prevent the miners from wantonly destroying their little property. On one occasion, the erection was entirely pulled down, and the partner severely maltreated. Leaving this inhospitable district, they went to North Shields ; but there the elements proved as hostile as the hand of man : the wind blew down the theatre ; and as it had been erected on the quay, a portion of it fell into the water, and was lost for ever. Scotch hurricanes proved equally unpropitious—as at an after-period his theatre in Johnstone, near Paisley, was levelled to the dust by Boreas. But yet another destructive force waged war against him. At Chowbent, near Manchester, he had been warned of the Vandalistic character of the natives, and he endeavoured to soothe them by costume and music. ‘Having adorned,’ says he, ‘my outward man in white trousers and a spangled jacket, I mounted a carpenter’s bench which I had borrowed, and immediately began a concert of instrumental music, the instruments consisting of an old tin trumpet, which I blew till I was nearly black in the face, at the same time beating a drum with my spare hand.’ Having collected a crowd, he told them that he had too high an opinion of their musical taste to imagine that they believed him to be a superior performer, and that his only object was to raise a crowd—which compliment disarmed their hostility, and he received no molestation.

But, independently of the frowns of nature, animate and inanimate, the everyday hardships of showman life are severe in the extreme. A touching passage in Mr Miller’s little work is the loss of the donkey, a story worthy of Sterne, the man ‘who wept over a dead ass and neglected a living mother.’ After a short run of luck, the author had capitalised to the extent of being able to purchase a donkey-cart valued at twelve shillings. The animal strayed one night from its pasturage on the common, and here are the owner’s reflections.

‘Imagine yourself to be in my situation—about a hundredweight of luggage, consisting of clothing for myself, wife, and two children, although of a very humble description ; a drum, magical apparatus, a box of mechanical figures, an old scene, and other etceteras that we used in earning our livelihood. A fair on the following day, twenty miles distant; funds very low, not more than sufficient to defray the night's expenses; and no means of getting forward. When this is all taken into consideration, my situation was not to be envied, and certainly no trifle. At length, after several hours' unsuccessful search for the lost animal, I determined to drag the cart along myself, a distance of twenty miles. I perseveringly proceeded with this task of difficulty and fatigue, and by a day and night's excessive labour, I accomplished my purpose. . . . . I could not afford to lose time, as the fair on the following day was all our dependence to procure funds for a fifty miles' journey. My last half-crown was expended for our night's accommodation and a frugal supper and breakfast. My wife having disposed of some article of clothing for half its value, I, as previously determined, packed up our all, took the place of the donkey, and dragged the cart, as before stated, for twenty miles; and if every one knew my situation, they would have acknowledged that I was not such an ass as I appeared to be.

'On the following morning, we arrived at Hanley, in Staffordshire, having travelled all night, both dreadfully fatigued, especially my poor wife, she having assisted in pushing up hills; indeed, without her aid, I never could have accomplished the journey. When we arrived there, we found several exhibitions, in one of which I procured a situation for four days, and for my services was to receive two pounds. Having applied for and obtained a few shillings in advance from my employer, I went to prepare for my day's work, having promised to commence business in half an hour. In the meantime, my wife was preparing our breakfast; but just as I was about to partake, I became dreadfully sick, my head swam, and I fell insensible on the floor. The exertion I had undergone was too much for me, and threw me into a fit of illness, from which I did not recover for several days. Although showmen do wage war against each other in their professional capacity, there are few who will not assist either one of their fraternity or any other individual in distress. A subscription was made for me, and during my illness, I did not want for anything. Upon my recovery, all the exhibitions had removed ; and upon inquiry, I learned that there was some sort of merry-making at a village a few miles from Hanley, and my first excursion after my illness was to this village. I procured a barn to exhibit in ; and having attired myself in russet boots, tights, and a Spanish tunic and hat, I sallied forth and blew a blast from an old tin trumpet. I soon collected a crowd, and acquainted them of my intention to exhibit in the barn. I did not make a fortune here. When the performance was concluded, I was only in possession of about seven or eight shillings, five of which I had agreed to pay for the barn ; and after doing so, prepared for our journey back to the town we had left. The handkerchief in which I had tied up my clothes was nowhere to be found : some one had stolen them. This was worse than the loss of the donkey. What was to be done ? I had no alternative but to walk back as I was. Fortunately it was night, and none could observe the strange figure I cut, and I arrived at my lodgings safe. The next day, my wife walked back again to the village, to ascertain if anything had been heard of my bundle, but without success. My case was desperate. I endeavoured to sell my cart and harness, to procure me some sort of clothing that would escape observation, but could not meet with a purchaser. The people where I lodged were very poor, and could not render me any assistance.'

A kind family in the village, having heard of the loss of the wardrobe, came forward in the most generous manner, and relieved the wants of the showman and his family.

Of the desperate struggle made by strolling players to get up any decent shew of theatrical properties, the following account is given of what we suppose was a real occurrence :—

the place of course had to be lighted ; but, although I had been very economical in my outlay, there was only one penny left in the treasury, with which we purchased a candle. This served to throw a light upon the movements of the first robber (the money-taker) ; but what was to be done for candles, as the room was in darkness ? At length, a gentleman presented himself, and tendered six-pence for a seat in the pit. Pit and gallery were both alike, being composed of forms which we had borrowed from a schoolmaster, on the promise of returning them next morning before school-hours. The sixpence I seized with alacrity, and immediately called out : " Dear me, what a time the boy is gone for the candles : here, go and fetch a pound ; he'll be all night," addressing myself to Mr Black, who, by his grins and sly winks, seemed to congratulate me upon having procured the means of lighting the place. The pound of candles having arrived, they were very expeditiously stuck into a wooden chandelier, constructed of six pieces of lath nailed across, and nails driven in for sockets. One gentleman, who sat under it, would be saved the expense of bear's grease for a long period, if he had been accustomed to use that article, his head having been well anointed with melted tallow, which at intervals dropped upon him ; his coat receiving a greater share than might be deemed desirable. A numerous party assembled ; in fact, I was very much elated with my success, having nearly two pounds in the house, which, considering all circumstances, was excellent business.

'I adopted rather a novel method of announcing the entertainment. We had no bills ; and the watchman's rattle I had used at the fair was the property of the Punch-and-Judy-man. I tried to borrow a bell, but without success. Where I lodged, I perceived in the kitchen a brass pestle and mortar, which I got the loan of from the landlady ; and issued forth, with the mortar slung to a piece of string. With the pestle, I made noise enough to collect a crowd, to whom I thus addressed myself : " Ladies and gentlemen, you will think it strange, no doubt, that I should be kicking up such a row with the pestle and mortar, and some of you may think I am mad, or have lost my senses, which is nearly as bad; but a peculiar circumstance—that is, the want of funds—has prevented me from announcing in the usual way a talented performance, which is to take place this evening, in Mr Smith's granary; and necessity, which has no law, and is the mother of invention, suggested that I should borrow my landlady's pestle and mortar, and by these means apprise you of my intentions.”

After enduring a variety of hardships, Mr Miller started a theatre in Glasgow, at which Macready, Fanny Kemble, Mrs Charles Matthews, and other dramatic notables starred; but as he infringed the patent of the previous Glasgow manager, he became involved in litigation—dark clouds came over the western drama, and, like Mr Owen, he was immured in a Glasgow jail. On being liberated, he turned vintner, but again fate predominated, and again he was placed in durance vile. Set at liberty a second time, he resumed the showman life, his booth being erected on a site in Glasgow Green, exactly opposite the theatre lately tenanted by him. In inviting the public to behold the penny wonders in his new establishment, he adverted to former days with a philosophy truly admirable; and to the call the people of Glasgow, whose kindness of heart is well known, liberally responded. Unfortunately, this new enterprise came to a sudden and melancholy end. The theatre was one night destroyed by fire; nothing was insured; and poor Miller was once more a ruined man. After this incident, he began a wandering life, making a public appearance here and there, and in this pursuit he is probably still engaged.

It is impossible to peruse the memoirs of this unfortunate individual without pitying the writer, and wishing him well quit of a line of life which seems beneath his varied talents. If his little book has the effect of deterring young men from plunging heedlessly into a theatrical career, it will not have been written in vain.

A SPORTSMAN IN INDIA.

HAVING in my young days acquired a taste for country sports, I carried this with me to India, where field recreations, in the way of extirpating wild animals, were of a more serious kind than I had been accustomed to. Not at all daunted, I became expert at hunting the jackal, the leopard, and the tiger. I had frequently heard of elephant-catching, and resolved to enjoy that noble sport also. To secure the accomplishment of my wishes, I sought an intimacy with the most expert hunters; and the little knowledge I possessed of the language, enabled me to explain my wish to accompany the next hunting-party. I professed willingness to obey every rule and instruction—I gave assurances of my courage and contempt of danger; which, accompanied with certain gratuities, obtained me the confidence of Tagore, one of the most expert and courageous elephant-hunters in India. Accordingly, I received his instructions how to act under various circumstances which might arise during this dangerous enterprise. In my earnestness, I frequently anticipated my tutor's instructions, and came to such just conclusions under difficult and trying occasions of probable danger, that Tagore seemed to place great reliance on my coolness and judgment. It was therefore arranged I should have the management of a female elephant with the next hunting-party.

Week after week passed in exercises occupying my thoughts by day and my dreams by night, until I verily believed I was master of all that could be required in the capture of an elephant. By kindness, and by often presenting favourite food to the female elephant I was to mount, I became familiar with her peculiarities, and secured her attachment, which I considered important, since, in cases of extreme danger, the elephant often preserves her rider. She would raise her leg for me to mount, caress me with her proboscis, and attend even to my whispered commands. Tagore noticed all these particulars, and confessed he had no doubt of my competence to meet any emergency. At length the day arrived, and our journey was commenced. We had to recruit ourselves at a distance from our starting-point, which required eight hours' travelling to accomplish. I was liberal to my elephant, as if she had been an Italian marchesa, whom I could captivate with bon-bons; and my expectation was answered. Tagore was surprised and gratified. Often while I was applauding her, I saw her little sparkling eyes turned upwards, and her proboscis came regularly over her broad forehead to receive my tribute of acknowledgment. I practised dismounting slowly, and regaining my seat expeditiously, to the entire satisfaction of Tagore.

In this way we travelled through jungles, over tracts of sedgy grass, up mounds, and down ravines, till we came into an open level country surrounded by gently-rising ground, covered with wood. We were approaching a grove with our minds raised to the highest pitch of excitement, when Tagore uttered an exclamation, and pointed to some straggling trees; my heart swelled with rapture, but I could not discover to what he would call my attention, till, shading my eyes from the sun's rays, and the heat refracted from the yellow dry jungle-grass, I saw a tremendous elephant! 'Excellent,' cried I; 'that is the fellow we must capture!' 'We will attempt it,' replied Tagore. We slung our cables and small cords on our arms, covered ourselves with cloths the colour of the elephants, and couched close on their necks. 'Follow me,' said Tagore; 'the animals know their business; do you be steady and act with me.' 'Proceed,' said I. As we jolted along, I perceived the huge elephant was very dark, with remarkably clean tusks of surprising length. I felt an indescribable sensation of delight at being about to enjoy what I had so long and so ardently desired. In perfect dependence on the skill of Tagore, and confidence in myself, I recalled the directions I had received.

Tagore slackened pace as he approached the monster, which seemed not to regard us, but continued to pluck branches from the limbs of a tree which stood in front of others that straggled on the edge of a neighbouring forest. Our elephants made a slight curve in their line of approach, and took some of the torn branches, at which the monster snorted so loud that my beast trembled. I was in a profuse perspiration, not altogether from alarm, but from being confined beneath my cloth, and receiving the humidity of the animal. I soon found myself on the left side of the monster, and my beast caressing him by rolling her proboscis over his head and shoulders. Tagore and his elephant were entirely hidden from me by the enormous bulk of the male, but I found by the gradual sidelong movement of the whole group, that we were placed so as to bring the legs of the male elephant near the trunk of a large tree. This was the moment to be seized. I slid cautiously down with my ropes, and found Tagore had already fastened his strongest rope round the tree. Our elephants became more assiduous in engaging the attention of the monster, or, as it were, more eloquently speaking the prologue of their loves. Tagore, with his finger on his lips and a nod to me, placed a noose round one leg of the enormous beast; the leg was raised, and kept suspended during a minute. It appeared an hour of the greatest excitement; and when the foot descended, the ground shook beneath us. I looked at Tagore; he was collected, but the pupils of his eyes were unshadowed by their lids, and large drops of perspiration trickled from his brow. During this period, his elephant rubbed the leg of the monster with her proboscis, as if to disguise the application of the ropes. This was the act for which Tagore waited: he drew the noose tight; in an instant we doubly secured it from slipping with smaller cords, and retreated to the rear. Our beasts immediately came jogging towards us. We regained our seats, covered ourselves with our cloths, and took a triumphant look at our tremendous captive. He was struggling with violence, and bellowing like thunder. We made towards the edge of the forest, with the intention to take a little refreshment after our arduous task, and wait till our captive was exhausted. I turned to congratulate Tagore on our success. 'Make for the nearest tree!' cried he, urging his beast forward. My heart nearly leaped from my breast.

The enraged monster had disengaged himself, and was following us. I gained the nearest tree, and had sprung from my elephant's neck to one of the extended branches as the monster came roaring up, his proboscis elevated within two feet of my body. Terrified as I was, it is surprising I did not lose my grasp, and fall a prey to his vengeance. I saw his fiery eyes directed towards me, and shook with horror, but managed to ascend a branch higher, and there sat in breathless agitation. I perceived my elephant lying near the tree, with my cloth on her neck. Tagore's beast was hastening away; he was not on her neck, but, horrid sight! I saw his cloth fixed on the monster's tusk. Tagore has fallen, thought I; and what is to become of me! But these speculations were stayed by the return of the bellowing monster. He looked at me; then, as if studying revenge, surveyed the body of the tree, and, like a battering ram, drove his immense weight against the trunk, with such repeated violence, that I was nearly shaken from my hold. He paused, and then commenced tearing the earth from the root of the tree with such vehemence, that I saw no possibility of escape when the tree should fall. My fortitude seemed to forsake me, and I contemplated casting myself to the ground, that my misery might not be protracted. Meanwhile, the small inflamed eyes of the monster were at intervals directed towards me as he pursued his attack, alternately tearing away the earth and straining his head against the tree. Heavens! what I felt as it yielded to the pressure. I prepared to render my almost lifeless being to the infuriated beast. The tree fell! but, by the eagerness of the exertion, in a slanting direction, and its summit became entangled with the lower limbs of an adjoining tree. Hope revived; not a moment was to be lost: I hastened from my post; the enraged monster watched me from limb to limb, waiting, as it were, to catch me on my passage to the other tree. I gained it with incredible rapidity, dreading another touch might bring the suspended tree to the ground.

I perceived my new resting-place was much stronger than that I had quitted, and began to breathe, as if I had some prospect of retaining life a little longer. The roarings of the beast became less and less terrific, and I could contemplate his actions in comparative security. The survey he took of the tree seemed to inform him it was too powerful to be overthrown. He snorted, glared around in fierce disappointment, and passed sullenly into the forest. I saw his huge form occasionally between the trees, and continued to watch him until the thickening foliage intervened. I then reflected on the great danger I had escaped. Escaped! the word dwelt on my mind, my escape being cut off by an enraged elephant. By remaining, I should be starved to death. The thought was distracting. My brave companion lost! my elephant gone! I looked around: nothing remained of our outset. I was wretched, and a revolution seemed to have taken place in my ideas respecting hunting. Man, thought I, considers the whole of the creation under his dominion; but let those who are thus arrogant be placed on a falling tree, with a furious beast beneath seeking their extermination, and I think they will ever after be inclined to admit they have overrated their powers. This was elevated philosophy, for I dared not descend; yet alarmed and exhausted as I was, it occurred to me that I had taken out my flask and refreshment at the moment we discovered the male elephant at liberty, and such was the force of hunger, that I contemplated venturing to search for them before night came on. The jungle-grass was high, but the tracks of the elephants remained evident; in one of them I hoped to gain what I so much required. I watched the declining power of the sun, and, summoning the shattered remnant of my fortitude, secured the branches of the trees where they crossed each other, so that, in case of necessity, I might ascend to my place of security. All was still. I descended, and proceeded in the track which I judged to be that made by my elephant, and at about thirty yards off discovered my flask. I grasped it as an inestimable treasure ; but I could not perceive any other portion of my stock. Like a bird, picking, and searching, and watching, while on ground unsafe, I became alarmed at the noise made by the rustling of the dried grass, and at my remoteness from the tree, the protector of my life.

Hurrying back, I stumbled on my cloth, and, by a kind of presentiment, caught it up. Just as I had regained the tree, a noise of something approaching almost deprived me of motion. I, however, saw, before I had reached my elevation, a boar rush rapidly along. I was out of reach, and, with a heart overflowing with thankfulness, raised the flask to my mouth ; in the act, my arm came in contact with a broken branch, and the flask was forced from my hand. Oh ! with what dismay did I witness it bound from limb to limb, until it reached the ground ! Farewell to the consolation that it might have afforded. The loss was irreparable.

Night was coming on apace, and, that the dews might not seriously affect me, I tied my cloth so as to permit its being put on my head in the manner of an extinguisher on a lamp. Alas ! thought I during the act, the light now obscured may never shine on me again ; yet, to render all secure as possible, I fastened myself to the upright stem of the tree, and sat astride one of the branches. Fatigue and silence induced a drowsiness, which I welcomed as a restoring balm to my harassed mind ; a few sighs seemed to give me relief ; yet the thought of perishing intruded, itself. This dreadful passage into cold obscurity startled the remaining energies of my mind. How celestial is hope ! what will it not enable us to endure ! I thought it possible that Tagore's elephant might return, and that her sagacity might lead to this spot those who were interested for our fates. There existed the possibility of his escape from the enraged elephant, although I had seen a cloth on its tusk.

The beast I had ridden was nowhere to be seen : she must have recovered from the shock, and hurried home. In these and other conjectures I indulged, till I sank into a repose, of what continuance I know not ; for I was awaked by a sudden weight pressing on my shoulders, and depriving me of motion. I uttered a yell of horror : no cause presented itself to my confused mind. In imagined security I had, by cloth and cords, prevented my seeing or moving. In this state of helplessness I remained till the cloth was gently raised. I groaned aloud, and, in an agony approaching to desperation, tore the cloth from my head. I felt at liberty, and saw the moonbeams playing on the branches beneath me, amongst which I thought I could perceive a moving object. No, nothing moved ; nothing could I hear ; even sunrise was wanting. Straining my eyes on every side, and listening in utmost anxiety, I unsheathed my dirk, till now forgotten in my cumberband, and sat till my tortured imagination and shattered nerves were sinking under this new accumulation of horrors. Again I saw an object moving. Danger, thought I, is deprived of half its terrors if we can meet it face to face. In a moment, a frightful countenance came close to mine from the other side of the tree. I struck my dirk into a body ; as it fell, I knew by the chattering shriek it was an ape. This is not hunting animals, thought I. Man should profit by experience. These noble sports, this seeking danger on an enraged elephant's tusk, is folly—infatuation—madness ! During these cogitations, just as morning dawned, I heard Tagore's voice in the distance ; he had brought both food and security in a strong party.

On our journey to the rendezvous, I learned that he had escaped by the manœuvres of his elephant and his own dexterity : that he had seen me ascend the tree when my elephant was borne down by the monster; but that she had escaped unhurt. 'So,' said Tagore, 'we have you, and all is well. When will you go hunting again?' 'Never—never more! I shall exhibit the effects of my last excursion by wrinkles on my face, which add twenty years to my age in appearance, and by the change of black hair into a spotless white; and on my mind there is impressed what no language can describe, nor time eradicate. I shall never more take to the hunting of elephants.'
